Wind-instrument (wind'in-stru-ment), n. An instrument of music, played by means of artificially produced currents of wind, as the organ, harmonium, &c., or by the human breath, as the flute, horn, &c., in all of which the vibration of a column of air produces the sound. The name is, however, generally restricted to the orchestral instruments of the second class, consisting of a tube (straight, bent, or curved), producing a fundamental tone with its harmonics or overtones when the vibrating column extends the whole length of the column extends the whole length of the tube. This column may, however, be short-ened by having holes of certain sizes and at certain distances along the tube, which are opened or stopped by the fingers or valves, the instrument being thus adapted to produce in its simpler forms the tones of the diatonic scale, and in its more complex forms the tones of the chromatic scale. The wind-instruments of an ordinary orcheatra are divided into two classes: wood chestra are divided into two classes: instruments, as the flute, oboe, clarionet, and bassoon; and brass instruments, as the and bassoon; and brass instruments, as the horn, cornet-a-pistons, trombone, suphonium, bombardon, and ophicleide. The quality of tone of the woods is soft, smooth, light, and almost vocal; that of the brasses is somewhat harder, more powerful and majestic. Being all fixed toned they cannot, of course, play in perfect tune like stringed instruments, and they can only produce one sound at a time.

Windmill (wind'mil), n. 1. A mill wflich receives its motion from the impulse of the wind, and which is used for grinding corn, pumping water, &c. The structure of a windmill is a conical or pyramidal tower of considerable height, with a conical or hemispherical dome. There are two kinds of windmills, the vertical and horizontal. In the former, a section of which is here given, the wind is made to act upon sails or vanes, AA (generally four in num-ber), attached by means of rectangu-lar frames to the extremities of the lar frames to the extremities of the principal axis or wind-shaft of the mill, which is placed nearly horizontal, so that the sails, by the action of the wind, revolve in a plane nearly vertical, giving a rotatory motion to the driving-wheel E fixed to the wind-shaft, and thus conveying motion to the vertical shaft F and the machinery connected with it. The extremity of the wind-shaft must always be placed so as ery connected with it. The extremity of the wind-shaft must always be placed so as to point to the quarter from which the wind blows. To effect this some mills have a self-adjusting cap B, which is turned round by the force of the wind acting upon the fan or fiyer C, attached to the projecting framework at the back of the cap. By means of a pinion on its axis, motion is given to the inclined shaft and to the wheel D on the restreat simple of the propose. inclined shart and to the wheel D on the vertical spindle of the pinion a, this latter pinion engages the cogs on the outside of the fixed rim of the cap; by these means the sails are kept constantly turned to the wind, the head of the mill moving slowly round the moment any change in the direction of the wind causes the fan c to revolve. In the horizontal windmill the wind-shaft is vertical, so that the sails revolve in a horivertical, so that the sails revolve in a horizontal plane. The effect of horizontal wind-mills, however, is considered to be far in-ferior to that of the vertical kind. The effect of windmills depends greatly upon the form and position of the sails. See also POST-MILL.—2. A visionary scheme; a vain project; a fancy; a chimera.

Wine (win), n. [A. Sax. wtn, borrowed (like D. win, Icel. win, Dan. viin, Goth. wein or wein, G. wein) from L. vinum, wine, which corresponds to Gr. vinus, with digamma voince or foince, withe. L. vinum, wine, is what is produced by vitis, the vine, the twining plant (cog. with E. withy), the root meaning to twine or twist, seen also in vitium, vice, and in E. to wind, wire, &c.]

1. The fermented juice of the grape or fruit of the vine (Vitis vinifera. See VITIS). Wines are distinguished practically by their colour, hardness or softness on the palate, their flavour, and their being still or effervescing. The differences in the quality of wines depend partly upon differences in the vines, but more on the differences of the soils in which they are planted, in the exposure of the vineyards, in the treatment of the grapes, and the mode of manufacturing the wines. whey ards, in the treatment of the grapes, and the mode of manufacturing the wines. When the grapes are fully ripe, they generally yield the most perfect wine as to strength and flavour. The leading character of wine, however, must be referred to the alcohol which it contains, and upon which its intoxicating powers principally depend. The amount of alcohol in the stronger ports and sherries is from 16 to 25 stronger ports and sherries is from 16 to 25 per cent; in hock, claret, and other light wines from 7 per cent. Wine containing more than 13 per cent of alcohol may be assumed to be fortified with brandy or other spirit. The most celebrated ancient wines spirit. The most celebrated ancient wines were those of Lesbos and Chios among the Greeks, and the Falernian and Cecuban among the Romans. The principal modern wines are Port. Sherry, Claret, Champagne, Madeira, Hock, Marsala, &c. &c. The varieties of wine produced are almost endless, and differ in every constituent according to and differ in every constituent according to and differ in every constituent according to the locality, season, and age, but generally the produce of each vineyard retains its own leading characteristics. The principal wine-producing countries are France, Germany, Spain, Portural Sicily Grance Constitution Spain, Portugal, Sicily, Greece, Cape Colony, Australia, and America.—2. wisdom (wiz'dom), n. [A. Sax. wisdom, from wis, wise, and the term. .dom (see Wisk and Don). Similar are leel visdom, r.S. wisdom, Dan. visdom, wisdom, wisdom.] 1. The quality of being wise; the power or faculty of seeing into the heart of things, and of forming the fittest and best judgment in any mat-ter presented for consideration; a combinater presented for consideration; a combina-tion of discernment, judgment, sagacity, or similar powers, involving also a certain amount of knowledge, especially knowledge of men and things gained by experience. It is often nearly synonymous with discretion, or with prudence, but both of these are strictly only particular phases of wisdom. Frequently we find it implying little more than sound common sense, perfect sound-ness of mind or intellect; hence it is often opposed to folly.

If you go on thus you will kill yourself;
And 'tis not wisdom thus to second grief
Against yourself.

Shak.

(d) Present participle.

Yet are these feet Swift-winged with desire to get a grave, As witting I no other comfort have. Shak. And why he left your court, the gods themselves, Wotting no more than I, are ignorant. Shak.

Wit (wit), n. [A. Sax. wit, gewit, knowledge, mind, understanding; Icel. vit, Dan. vid, G. witz, understanding, wit. See the verb.] 1. Intellect, understanding or mental powers

Your wit will not so soon out as another man's witis strongly wedged up in a block-head. Shak

Will puts in practice what the wit deviseth; Will ever acts, and wit contemplates still.

A faculty or power of the mind or i tellect: generally used in the plural; as, he has all his wits about him.

But there are many who have a bad trick of minding the preacher carefully enough for a minute or two, and then letting their wits wander, and thinking about something else. Kingsley.

—The five wits, an old expression sometimes used for the five senses, but oftener defined: common wit, imagination, fautasy, estimation, memory.

If our wits run the wild-goose chase, I have done, for thou hast more of the wild-goose in one of thy wits, than I have in my whole five.

Shak.

But my five wits nor my five senses can Dissuade one foolish heart from serving thee.

—At one's wits' end, at a loss what further steps or measures to adopt; having exhausted the last known plan or contrivance; unable to think further.

The neighbourhood were at their wits' end, to consider what would be the issue. Sir R. L'Estrange.

To live by one's wits, to live by shifts or expedients, as one without a regular means Addison sent to beg Gay, who was then living by his wife about town, to come to Holland House.

Macaulay.

A superior degree of intelligence or under-standing; bright reasoning powers; sense; judgment; wisdom; sagacity.

Judgment; wiscom, waster is a kind of knave.

I have the wit to think my master is a kind of knave.

Shak.

If I might teach thee wil, better it were.
Though not to love, yet, love, to tell me so. Shak. He wants not wit the danger to decline. Dryden.

4. The power of invention; the inventive faculty; contrivance; ingenuity. 'Each several stone, with wit well blazon'd.' Shak.

He had not the wit to invent new capitals in the same style; he therefore clumsily copied the old ones.

Ruskin.

5.† The power of original combination under the influence of the imagination; the imaginative faculty.

Wit in poetry . . . is no other than the faculty of imagination in the writer, which . . . searches over all the memory for the species or ideas of those things which it designs to represent. Dryden.

6. The faculty of associating ideas in a new 6. The faculty of associating ideas in a new and ingenious, and at the same time natural and pleasing way exhibited in apt language; the felicitous combination of words and thoughts by which unexpected resemblances between things apparently unlike are viv-idly set before the mind so as to produce a shock of pleasant surprise; facetiousness.

shock of pleasant surprise; facetiousness.

Wit lies most in the assemblage of ideas, and putting those together with quickness and variety, wherein can be found any resemblance or congruity, thereby to make up pleasant pictures and agreeable visions to the fancy.

True wit consists in the resemblance of ideas.

But every resemblance of ideas is not what we call wit, and it must be such an one that gives delight and surprise to the reader. Where the likeness is obvious, it creates no surprise, and is not wit. Thus, when a poet tells us that the bosom of his mistress is as white as snow, there is no wif in the comparison; but when he adds, with a sigh, it is as cold too, it then grows into wit.

Dryden.

True wit is nature to advantage drest, What oft was thought, but ne'er so well exprest.

[The two extracts following bear on the distinction between wit and humour.]

OBSENTATION OF TRUSHER SAYS THAT WIT FOLKERS TO THE MANUAL TO THE MEMORY TO THE MEMORY THAT WIT FOLKERS THE MEMORY THAT WIT FOLKERS THE MEMORY ALWAYS EXCITES LAUGHTER BUT WIT DOESN'T WHAT WIT OF THE MEMORY WILLIAM THAT WHEN THE MEMORY WHEN

tion is requisite to comprehend wit. Fleming.

It is no uncommon thing to hear 'He has humour rather than wit.' Here the expression commonly means pleasantry: for whoever has humour has with, although it does not follow that whoever has with although it does not follow that whoever has with and individes in breadth of drollery rather than in play and brilliancy of point. Wit vibrates and spirts; humour springs up exuberantly as from a fountain and runs on. In Congreve you wonder what he will say next: in Addison you repose on what is said, listening with assured expectation of something congenial and pertinent. The French have little humour, because they have little character: they excel all nations in wit because of their levity and sharpness.

Landor.

7. One having genius, fancy, or humour: in modern usage, one who excels in the faculty defined in last definition: one distinguised for bright or amusing sayings; a humorist.

The dulness of the fool is the whetstone of the wits

O, sure I am, the wits of former days
To subjects worse have given admiring praise

Intemperate wits will spare neither friend nor foe.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

Witchcraft (wich'kraft), n. 1. The practices of witches; sorcery; a supernatural power which persons were formerly supposed to obtain by entering into compact with the devil. Indeed it was fully believed that they gave themselves up to him, body and soul, while he engaged that they should want for nothing, and be able to assume whatever shape they pleased, to visit and torment their enemies, and accomplish their infernal purposes. As soon as the baryain was conpurposes. As soon as the bargain was concluded, the devil was said to deliver to the witch an imp or familiar spirit, to be ready at call, and to do whatever it was directed. By the aid of this imp and the devil together, the witch, who was almost always an old woman, was enabled to transport herself through the air on a broomstick, and to transform herself into various shapes, particularly those of cats and hares; to inflict diseases on whomsoever she pleased, and to punish her enemies in a variety of ways. The belief in witchcraft is very ancient. It The belief in witchcraft is very ancient. It was a common belief in Europe till the sixteenth century, and maintained its ground with tolerable firmness till the middle of the seventeenth century; indeed it is not altogether extincteven at the present day. A phrase in one of our occasional Services has sometimes offended those who are unacquainted with the early uses of English words.

I refer to the words in our Marriage Service with my body I thee words in our Marriage Service with my body I thee worthip. But "worship" or "worthiship" meant honour in our early English, and to worship to honour, this meaning of worship still very harmlessly surviving in the title of 'your worship' and resident to the magistrate on the bench. So little was it restricted of old to the honour which man is bound to pay to God, that it was employed by Wiclif to express the honour which God will render to his faithful servants and friends. Thus, our Lord's declaration. If any man serve me, him will my Father honour,' in Wiclif's translation reads thus, 'If any man serve me, my Father shall worship him.'

Z, the twenty-fourth letter of the English alphabet, was borrowed by the Romans in comparatively late times from the Greeks, and passed from the Roman into the Anglo-Saxon alphabet. The Greek X, however, was a gutural, probably like the Scotch or German ch, and why in Latin it should have assumed the functions of the Greek character $\mathbf{z}(=x)$ is not very clear. Except when used at the beginning of a word, x in English is a double consonant (as it was in Latin and Greek), and has usually the sound of ks, as in wax, lax, axis, &c.: but when terminating a syllable, especially an initial syllable, if the syllable following it is open or accented, it often takes the sound of gx, as iluxury, exhaust, exalt, exotic, &c. At the beginning of a word it has precisely the sound of z. Hence it is entirely a superfluous letter, representing no sound that could not easily be otherwise represented. not easily be otherwise represented initial it occurs in a few words borrowed from the Greek, never standing in this position in words that are properly English in from the Greek, never standing in this position in words that are properly English in origin.—As a numeral X stands for ten. It represents one V, which stands for five, placed above another, the lower one being inverted. When laid horizontally, thus \bowtie , it stands for a thousand, and with a dash over it, thus \overline{X} , it stands for ten thousand. —As an abbreviation X. stands for Christ, as in Xn. Y, the twenty-fifth letter of the English alphabet, was taken from the Latin, the Latin alphabet, was taken from the Latin, the Latin having borrowed it from the Greek Y or upsilon. In the Anglo-Saxon alphabet it was always a vowel, and is believed to have had a sound resembling that of French u or German u, this being also the sound which the Greek Y is believed to have had. In modern English it is both a consonant and the Greek T is believed to have had. In modern English it is both a consonant and a vowel, and seldom or never is the historical representative of A. Sax. y, this being usually represented by i. At the beginning of syllables and followed by a vowel it is a consonant of the palatal class, being formed by bringing the middle of the tongue in contact with the palate, and nearly in the position to which the plant brings it. Hence it has happened that in a great number of words g has been softened into y, as A. Sax. gedr into year, geornian into yearn, deginto day. As an adjective termination it commonly represents A. Sax. is, as in stony = A. Sax. stanig, greedy = A. Sax. grædig, hungry = A. Sax. hungrig, many = A. Sax. manig. In some nouns it also represents the term. ig, as in honey = A. Sax. hungrig, withy = A. Sax. withig. In the term. ig, us thands for ic or ice, as in godly = A. Sax. godlic, friendly = A. Sax. friendle, fully = A. Sax. fundly, and say in the propersents of the propersent of the properse L. -ium, the noun termination, as in study, remedy, subsidy, &c., or the adjective term.

-ius, as in notary, contrary, secondary, &c.
In nouns ending in -ty the -ty represents
Fr. -té, L. -tas, -tatis, as invanity, calamity, &c. In the middle and at the end of words y is a vowel, and is precisely the same as i. It is sounded as i long, when accented, as in defy, rety, dying; and as i short when unaccented, as in vanity, glory, synonymous. As a consonant this letter bears much the same relation to i (short) as w does to u; thus i short has in certain positions—as in the iaof Christian—a tendency to pass into y. Y is sometimes called the Pythagorean letter, from its Greek original representing, by means of its three limbs, the sacred triad, formed by the duad proceeding from the monad.—In chem. Y is the symbol of yttrium.—Y, as a numeral, stands for 160, and with a dash over it, \overline{Y} , for 150,000. Y-. A common prefix in Old English words, as in y-clept, y-clad, &c., representing A. Sax. ge-, which assumed this form by the com-ge-, which assumed this form by the common weakening of g to y. The meaning of words with this prefix is usually the same as if it were absent. See GE.

G. güscht, yeast, from a verb signifying to ferment seen in O.H.G. gesan, signifying to ferment seen in O.H.G. gesan. jesan, Mod. G. gühren, gischen, Sw. güsa, to ferment, to froth. Allied to Gr. zeō, to boll, zelos, E. zeal.] 1. Barm; ferment; the yelrefinell, to their American and the vertical series, to both action, exclain a Barm; ferment; the yellowish substance, having an acid reaction, produced during the vinous fermentation of saccharine fluids, rising partly to the surface in the form of a frothy, floculent, viscid matter (surface yeast), and partly falling to the bottom (sediment yeast). Yeast consists of aggregations of minute cells, each cell constituting a plant, Torula exercisis. The yeast plant is a fungus, or rather a particular state of fungus, for there are many moulds which, under certain conditions, acquire the torula property, that is, become capable of decomposing sugar. The cell consists of a cyst composed of cellulose, inclosing a semi-fluid matter, essentially identical with protein. When a surface yeast-cell has attained full size, it gives off a little bud, which, on attaining the size of the first, gives out another bud, and in this the first, gives out another bud, and in this way the cells undergo exceedingly rapid multiplication. The germs of the yeast-plant are supposed to exist in countless multitudes in the atmosphere, from the fact that a saccharine solution which presents no surface to the atmosphere does not ferment, while on its being so exposed fermentation sets in. Fermentation takes place sooner and goes on more rapidly when the state is added then when the fluid is meanly mentation takes in. Fermentation takes place sooner and goes on more rapidly when yeast is added than when the fluid is merely exposed to the atmosphere, beer yeast possessing the property of setting up fermentation in the highest degree. Surface yeast is formed at 65 to 77 Fahr., and its action is rapid and irregular, whereas sediment yeast is formed at 32 to 45, and its action is slow and quiet. Sediment yeast is reproduced by spores and not by buds. In their chemical relations the two do not appear to differ. Yeast varies in quality according to the nature of the liquid in which it is generated. and yeast merchants distinguish several varieties, which are employed for different purposes according to their energy and activity. Yeast is not only essential to the production of wine from grape juice and other fruit juices, the manufacture of beer, and the preparation of distilled spirits, but it is also the sgent in producing the panary fermentation whereby bread is rendered letter provider. panary fermentation whereby bread is ren-dered light, porous, and spongy. Beer yeast is employed medicinally as a stimulant in low fevers, and is of great service in cases where, from inflammatory symptoms, is inadmissible.—German yeast, common yeast collected, drained, and pressed till nearly dry. It can be so kept for several months, and is much used by bakers.—Patent yeast, yeast collected from a wort of malt and hop, and treated similarly to German yeast.—Artificial yeast, a dough of or man and not and reacted similarly to German yeast. — Artificial yeast, a dough of flour and a small quantity of common yeast made into small cakes and dried. Kept free from moisture, it long retains its fermenta-tive property. —2. Spume or foam of water;

Yew (Taxus baccata).

nat. order or sub-order Taxacese. The com-mon yew is T. baccata, indi-genous in most parts of Europe, and found in many parts of Great Britain and Ireland. It is a low tree, usually rising 3 or 4 feet from the ground, and then sending out numerous spreading branches, forming a dense head of foliage often 30 to 40 feet high. On account of its gloomy and feet high. On account of its gloomy and funereal aspect it was very frequently planted in churchyards, and is thus associated by our poets with death, the grave, bereavement, gloom, and the like. Its wood was extensively used in the manufacture of bows previous to the discovery of gunpowder, and the name has by several writers been used as synonymous with bow, much in the same way as steet for sword. 'With his yew and ready quiver.' Sylvester. At first the brandished arm the lavelin threw.

At first the brandished arm the javelin threw, Or sent winged arrows from the twanging year

In our own days, on account of the durability of the timber, and of its hard, compact, close grain, it is much employed by cabinet-makers and turners. The American yew (T. baccata canadensis) is a low prostrate shrub, never forming an erect trunk. It is found in Canada and the more northern of the United States, and is commonly called Ground-hemlock.

Z.

Z, the last letter of the English alphabet, is a sibilant consonant, and is merely a vocal or sonant S, having precisely the same sound that s has in wise, ease, please, &c. (See S.) It did not have a place in the Anglo-Saxon It did not have a place in the Anglo-Saxon alphabet, though no doubt s had sometimes this sound. In old English of the fourteenth century it was common, and in some writings was often used where we now have s. The words in modern English which begin with z are all derived from other languages, mostly from the Greek. The case was the same in Latin, in which this letter was never really naturalized. When not initial, however, the case is different, and we often find it representing an older s in genuine English words, as in blaze, freeze, gazz, grazz, grazz, d. z. &c. As a final it occurs in some onomatopoetic words, as in buzz, whize. In German z is very common, being a double consonant, with the sound ts. In Greek it was also a double consonant = ds or sd. In Britain its name is zed, in America

A most auspicious star.

Zenith distance. The zenith distance of a heavenly body is the arc intercepted between the body and the zenith, being the same as the co-altitude of the body. Zenith sector, an astronomical instrument for measuring with great accuracy the zenith distances of stars which pass near the zenith. It is also used in trigonometrical surveys for determining the difference of latitude of two stations by observing the difference of the zenith distances of the same star at the two stations as it passes the meridian. It consists essenas it passes the meridian. It consists essentially, as its name implies, of a portion of a divided circle. See SECTOR.—Zenith telescope, a geodetical instrument, having adjustments in altitude and azimuth, a graduated vertical semicircle, a level, and a micrometer: used for measuring the difference of the zenith distances of two stars as a means of determining the latitude, the stars being such as pass the meridian about the same time, but on opposite sides of the zenith.

Zenithal (ze'nith-al), a. Of or pertaining to the zenith. 'The deep zenithal blue.'

Tyndall.

Zeolite (zě'ō-līt), n. [Gr. zeō, to boil, to foam, and lithos, stone: so named originally by Cronstedt from their boiling and swelling when heated by the blow-pipe.] A generic name of hydrated double silicates in which name of hydrated double silicates in which the principal bases are aluminium and calcium. Zeolites frequently contain fron, magnesium, and alkalies. Zeolites intumesce before the blow-pipe. They are decomposed by acids, yielding silica. Among them are analcime, apophyllite, harmotome, stilbite,&c. Zeolitic (ze-ō-lit'ik), a. Pertaining to zeolite; consisting of zeolite or resembling it. Zeolitiform (ze-ō-lit'i-form), a. Having the form of zeolite.
Zeolhyr (zet'er), n. [L. zephyrus, from Gr. zephyros, allied to zophos, darkness, gloom, the west. The poets personify Zephyrus, and make him the most mild and gentle of all the sylvan deities.] 1. The west wind; and poetically, any soft, mild, gentle breeze.

Zeuglodon (zū'glo-don), n. [Gr. zeuglē, the strap or loop of a yoke, and odous, odnos, a tooth, lit. yoke-tooth: so called from the peculiar form of its molar teeth.] An extinct genus of marine mammals, regarded by Huxley as intermediate between the true category and the carmiyorous seels. The tinct genus of marine mammals, regarded by Huxley as intermediate between the true cetaceans and the carnivorous seals. The species had an elongated snout, conical incisors, and molar teeth with triangular serrated crowns, implanted in the jaws by two roots, each molar appearing to be formed of two separate teeth united at the crown (whence the generic name). They belong to the eocene and mlocene, the best known species being Z. cetoides of the middle cocene of the United States, which attained a length of 70 feet. The first found remains were believed to be those of a reptile, and the name Basilosaurus was therefore given to them.

Zeuglodontides (zū-glo-don'ti-dē), n.pl. An extinct family of cetaceans, of which Zeuglodon is the type.

Zeugnynmi, to join. See Yoke.] A figure in grammar in which two nouns are joined to a verb suitable to only one of them, but suggesting another verb suitable to the other noun; or in which an adjective is similarly used with two nouns.

Zinc (zingk), n. [Fr. zinc, G. Sw. and Dan. zink; allied to G. zinn, tin.] Sym. Zn. At. wt. 65. A metal frequently called spetter in commerce. It has a strong metallic lustre and a bluish-white colour. Its texture is lamellated and crystalline, and its specific gravity about 7. It is a hard metal, being acted on by the file with difficulty, and its toughness is such as to require considerable force to break it when the mass is large. At low or high degrees of heat it is brittle, but between 250° and 300° F. it is both mallerable and ductile, and may be rolled or able and ductile, and may be rolled or hammered into sheets of considerable thin-ness and drawn into wire. Its malleability is considerably diminished by the impuriis considerably diminished by the impuri-ties which the zinc of commerce contains. It fuses at 773° F., and when slowly cooled crystallizes in four- or six-sided prisms. Zinc undergoes little change by the action of air and moisture. When fused in open vessels it absorbs oxygen and forms the white oxide called flowers of zinc. Heated with the order and burner of zine. Incased strongly in air it takes fire and burns with a beautiful white light, forming oxide of zine. Zine is found in considerable abundance. It does not occur in the native state, but is obtained from its ores, which are chiefly the sulphide, or zine-blende, and the chiefly the sulphide, or zino-blende, and the carbonate or calamine. The oxide of zinc (ZnO) is a fine white powder insoluble in water, but very soluble in acids, which it neutralizes, being a very powerful base, of the same class as magnesia. It combines also with some of the alkalies. Zinc forms a series of compounds with organic radicles, such as zinc methyl, Zn(CH₂h₂, and zinc ethyl, Zn(C₂H₂), Several of the salts of zinc are employed in medicine, as the sulphate or white viriol (ZnSO₂), the chloride or butter of zinc (ZnCl₂), the acetate and the cyanide. Sheet-zinc is largely employed for lining spouts, pipes, for covering roofs, and several other architectural purposes. Plates of this sponts, pipes, for overlag roots, and severla other architectural purposes. Plates of this metal are used as generators of electricity in voltaic batteries, &c.; they are also em-ployed in the production of pictures, &c., in the style of woodcuts. (See ZINCOGRAPHY.) Zinc is much employed in the manufacture

Zircon (zer'kon), n. [Cingalese.] (Zr SO O₄)

A mineral originally found in Ceylon, and forming one of the gems, being met with either colourless or coloured. Zircon, hycinth, and zirconite are regarded as varieties of the same species. They are essentially silicates of zirconium, generally containing minute portions of iron. The primitive form of the crystals is an octahedron, common form is a rectangular four-sided prism.
Called sometimes Jargon.

Zirconic (2èr-kon'ik), a. Of, pertaining to, or containing zirconium. Zirconite (zèr-kon-it), n. A variety of the zircon.

Zirconium (zer-kō'ni-um), n. Sym. Zr. At. wt. 89 6. The metal contained in zirconia. Berzelius first obtained zirconium in 1824; Berzelius first obtained zirconium in 1824; but Davy had previously rendered its existence quite probable. It is commonly obtained in the form of a black powder, but it is also known in the crystalline state, forming blackish-gray highly lustrous lamine, having a specific gravity of 4·15. Zirconium forms a chloride ZrCl4, and an oxide ZrO9, commonly known as zirconia. It exists in a few rare minerals, notably in zircon or hyacinth, which is a silicate of zirconium. It appears to form a link between aluminium and silicon.

Zither Zithern (tsit'er, tsit'ern), n. [G. from L. cithara. See CITHARA.] A stringed musical instrument consisting of a sounding-box plereed with a large circular sound-musical instrument consisting of a sound-ing-box pierced with a large circular sound-hole near the middle, the strings, to the number of thirty-one in the more perfect forms of the instrument, being made of steel, brass, catgut, and silk covered with fine silver or copper wire, and tuned by pegs at one end. Five of the strings are stretched over a fretted keyboard, and are

Zoology (zō-ol'o-ji), n. [From Gr. zōm, an animal, and logos, discourse.] That science which treats of the natural history of animal state of the natural history of the natural history of animals. which treats of the natural history of animals, or their structure, physiology, classification, habits, and distribution. The term 'natural history' has been frequently used as synonymous with zoology, but such a term is obviously of wider significance, and should be used to indicate the whole group of the natural sciences. Zoology is a branch of biological science, constituting, in fact, with its neighbour branch botany, the science of biology. Its study comprehends such branches as the morphology of animals, or the science of form or structure, mals, or the science of form or structure, which again includes comparative anatomy, by which we investigate external and internal appearances, the positions and relations of organs and parts; the development of animals, which treats of the various stages leading from the embryonic to the mature state; the physiology of animals, which includes the study of the functions of nutrition, reproduction, and of the nervous system; classification or taxonomy, which sessions to the various individuals their tion, reproduction, and of the nervous system; classification or taxonomy, which assigns to the various individuals their proper place in the scale of life. A new department has been added in recent times, sometimes called stiology, which investigates the origin and descent of animals, or treats of the evolutionary aspects of zoological science. Various systems of classification have been fremed by zoologists. Lin gates the origin and descent of animais, or treats of the evolutionary aspects of zoological science. Various systems of classification have been framed by zoologists. Linneus divided the animal kingdom into six classes, viz. Manmalia, Birds, Fishes, Amphibia, Insects, and Worms (Vermes). Cuvier proposed a more scientific arrangement. He divided the animal kingdom into four sub-kingdoms, viz. Vertebrata, Mollusca, Articulata, and Radiata. Recent classifications are more strictly based on morphological characters. Professor Huxley recognizes the following sub-kingdoms: Vertebrata, Mollusca, Molluscoida, Calenterata, Annulosa, Annuloida, Infusoria, and Protoza. See these terms.

Zoomorphic (zō-o-morfik), a. [Gr. zōon, a living being, an animal forms; exhibiting animal forms. 'That peculiarly Celtic form of interlacing zoomorphic decoration, united with coloured designs of diverging spirals and trumpet scrolls.' Jos. Anderson.

PRONOUNCING VOCABULARY

\mathbf{OF} GREEK, LATIN, SCRIPTURAL.

OTHER ANCIENT NAMES.

RULES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PRONUNCIATION.

The pronunciation indicated in the following list is that | usually heard from educated speakers of English, who as a rule do not attempt to pronounce Greek or Latin or Scriptural names in the way in which they were pronounced by the ancients themselves—if that could be with certainty determined—but rather seek to assimilate the pronunciation to that of their own language. There is therefore no great difficulty in the pronunciation of such words, and by attention to the following rules and directions any name in the list can be sounded correctly.

Special knowledge required for the right pronunciation of these words is-

1. The seat of accent; and

2. The sound to be given to the letters as they stand in the word.

The syllable of the word which is to receive the accent is denoted by the usual mark, an acute accent, placed immediately after it, as the first syllable of the word Ca'to, the second of the word Cam-by'ses, and the third of the word San-cho-ni'a-thon. The seat of the accent varies considerably in words of more than two syllables, though it is never on the last syllable; in dissyllables it is always on the first. The pronunciation of the latter, therefore, as also of monosyllabic words, after the following remarks are studied, will present no difficulty, and consequently many of them (especially those belonging to the classical languages) have been omitted from the list below. The division into separate syllables is denoted by the mark - as well as by the accentuation mark. Two vowels coming together in a word, but having one or other of these marks between them, must therefore always be pronounced as belonging to different syllables.

The sounds to be given to the several letters will be considered under two general heads, viz.: 1. The vowel letters; and 2. The consonant letters. It must always be borne in mind that silent letters, so common in English (e final for instance), are the exception in the words here treated of.

I. THE VOWEL LETTERS.

The vowels heard in the words fate, me, pine, note, and tube, are called long vowels; while those heard in the words fat, met, pin, not, and us, are called short vowels.

1. When any of the vowel letters a, e, i, o, and u, constitute an accented syllable, and also when they end one, they are pronounced as long vowels; thus, in the first syllable of the words Ca'to, Pe'lops, Di'do, So'lon, and Ju'ba, they are pronounced as in the respective key-words fate, me, pine,

2. When the vowel letters are followed by one or more consonants in a syllable, they are pronounced as short vowels; thus, in the first syllable of the words Cas'ca, Heo'u-ba, Cin'na, Cor'du-ba, and Pub'li-us, they are pronounced as in the respective key-words fat, met, pin, not, and us.

3. When the letter a constitutes an unaccented syllable, as in A-by'dos, and when it ends one, as in Ju'ba, it is pronounced as a in fat.

4. The so-called diphthongs α , α , are always pronounced as the e of me, and are therefore simple vowel sounds, as in Cæ'sar, Pæs'tum, Æ'o-lus, Bœ-o'ti-a.

5. The digraph ai in a syllable is pronounced like ai in wait. It occurs only in Scriptural names. The ai of Greek words was pronounced like common English affirmative ay, or much the same as i in pine; but by the common spelling it is Latinized into a. An a and an i coming together, but belonging to different syllables, will of course have either the accent or the mark - between them.

6. When r follows a in the same syllable, and is itself followed by a consonant, as in Argo, Car-thago, the a is pronounced as in far. In such a word as Ara-dus it is sounded as in fat.

7. The digraph au, as in Clau'di-us, Au-fid'i-us, is pronounced as a in fall. An a and a u coming together, however, may belong to different syllables, as in Em-ma'us.

8. When e constitutes an unaccented syllable, as in the first of the word E-te'o-cles, and when it ends one, as in E-vad'ne, it is pronounced as e of me. And when e is followed by s as the final letter of a word, as in Her'mes, Ar-is-toph'a-nes, it is always pronounced as e of me. 9. When e is followed by r in the same syllable, as in Her'mes, Mer-cu'ri-us, the e is pronounced as e of her. The letters i, u, and y, before r, have the same sound, as in Vir'gil, Bur'sa, Cyr'nus. When er is followed by a vowel, however, e is sounded as in met, thus Er'a-to, Mer'o-e.

10. The digraph ei, as in Plei'a-des, is pronounced as i of pine. An e and i coming together, however, may belong to different syllables. Compare Rules 5 and 7.

11. The diphthong or digraph eu, as in Leu-cip'pus, E-leu'sis, Ti-mo'theus, is pronounced as u of tube. It occurs chiefly in Greek names. In other cases the e and u belong to separate syllables. Compare Rules 10 and 7.

12. When i constitutes the first and last syllables of words, whether accented or not, as in I-be'ri-a, Fa'bi-i, it is pronounced as i of pine. And i as the terminal vowel of a syllable at the end of words is also so pronounced, as in Im'ri, A-ceph'a-li.

13. But i at the end of any other unaccented syllable than the last, as in In'di-a, Fa'bi-i, is pronounced as i of pin.

14. In many cases i assumes the value of y consonant in English; thus Aquileia is pronounced as if Aqui-le'ya, Caius as if Ca'yus. This is especially common in the terminations of words.

15. O at the end of an unaccented syllable, as also when constituting an unaccented syllable by itself, is generally pronounced long or of medium length. Followed by r in the same syllable, as in Gor'gus, it is not usually pronounced long, but as o of not. The o in such a position is, however, by some speakers pronounced rather long than short, this being pretty much a matter of taste.

16. At the end of an unaccented syllable, or forming an unaccented syllable (as in Æs'u-læ, A-bi'hu), u is pronounced much the same as when accented, but shorter. q it is pronounced as w; thus the second syllable of Equicolus is pronounced exactly as the English word quick.

17. The letter y is pronounced as i would be in corresponding positions; thus the y in Ty'a-na is as i of pine; and the y in Tyn'da-rus as i of pin.

II.—THE CONSONANT LETTERS.

The consonant letters, b, d, f, h, j, k, l, m, n, p, q, r, v, y, and z, have each but one sound, and as that is the English sound, they present no difficulty. The letters c, g, s, t, and x, have each more than one sound, and hence require rules to pronounce them aright.

1. C and g are hard, or sounded as in call and gun respectively, when immediately followed by the vowel letters a, o, and u, either in the same or in the following syllable, as in Cas'ca, Cor-ne'li-a, Cur'ti-us, Hec'a-te, Hec'u-ba, Gal'lus, Gor'di-um, Au-gus'tus, Meg'a-ra, Teg'u-la. C and g are also hard immediately before other consonant letters, as in Clau'di-us, Cras'sus, Eo-bat'a-na, Hec'tor, Glau'cus, Gra'vi-us, Bag'- ra-da, Bo-du-ag-na'tus.

2. C and g are soft when immediately followed by the vowel letters e, i, and y, either in the same or in the following syllable, as in Cerbe-rus, Cin'na, Cy-re'ne, Cic'e-ro, Tic'i-da, Gel'li-us, Gis'co, Gy'as, Vo-log'e-ses, Um-brig'i-us. In words such as Dacia, Sicyon, Phocion, Accius, Glaucia, Cap-pa-do'ci-a, the ci or cy, having the accent immediately before it, is often pronounced as shi: some authorities, however, retain the s sound in such words.

3. In Scriptural names, such as Megiddo, Gideon, g is always hard, except in the single word Bethphage. In consulting the list this will have to be kept in mind. The s.

following Scriptural names will serve as a guide.

4. When c and g are initial letters of a syllable, and immediately followed by n or by t, they are usually left silent in pronunciation; thus, Cneus is pronounced Ne'us; Gnidus, Ni'dus; and Ctenos, Te'nos. Some scholars, however, pronounce the c and g in these combinations; and should the reader elect to do so, he must pronounce them hard.

5. In Scripture names h often follows a vowel in the same syllable; as in Micah, Isaiah, Calneh, the vowel in these cases being pronounced with its short sound and the h being mute. In Greek names rh is equivalent to simple r.

6. The digraph ch is pronounced as k, thus, Achilles is pronounced A-killes; Chios, Ki'os; Enoch, E'nok. The Scripture name Rachel is the single exception to this rule, ch in it being sounded as in chain.

- 7. S as an initial of words is pronounced as s of the word son, as in So'lon, Spar'ta, Styx. It is commonly so pronounced as an initial of other than the first syllable of words, as in Su'sa, Si-sen'na; but in some exceptional cases the s receives the sound of z, as in the word Cæsar, which is pronounced Cæ'zar. These exceptions will be denoted by the direction 's as z,' inclosed within parentheses, thus, Cæ'sar (s as z). See also rule 10.
- 8. S final of words, when preceded by e, is pronounced as z; thus Aristides is pronounced Ar-is-ti'dez. And the e so placed is that of the word me as remarked already. But when the final s is preceded by any other vowel, it is pronounced as s of son, as in Archytas, Amphipolis, Abydos, Adrastus.
- 9. S at the end of words, when preceded by a liquid, l, m, n, or r, is pronounced as z, as in Mars, which is pronounced Marz; Aruns, A'runz.

10. Si forming an unaccented syllable, preceded by an accented syllable with a final consonant, and followed by a vowel, is commonly pronounced shi; as in Al'si-um, Hor-ten'si-us. When the st is preceded by a vowel it is very commonly pronounced as zi, as in Mœ'si-a, He'si-od, A-le'si-a, Cæ'si-us; and sometimes as the s of pleasure, as in As-pa'si-a, Theodo'si-a. But the usage in these cases is not very well settled, and some scholars carefully preserve the pure sound of the s, and do not even in such situations allow it to degenerate.

11. When ti followed by a vowel occurs next after the accented syllable of a word, it is pronounced as sh; thus, Statius is pronounced Sta'shi-us; Helvetii, Hel-ve'shi-i; and similarly with Abantias, Actium, Maxentius, Laertius, &c. The proper sound of the t is preserved, however, when ti is accented or when it follows s or another t, as in Mil-ti'a-des, Sal-lus'ti-us, Brut'ti-i; so also in the termination -tion, as in A-e'ti-on. In such words as Domitius the t itself may be said to receive the sh sound: Do-mish'i-us.

12. The digraph th is pronounced as th of the word thin, as in Tha-li'a.

13. X at the beginning of syllables is pronounced as z, thus, Xenophon is Zen'o-phon. But at the end of syllables it retains its voiceless sound of ks, thus Oxus is pronounced Oks'us. If, however, the x end a syllable which immediately precedes a vowel in the accented syllable, then the x receives its voiced sound, that of hard g followed by z, as in Alexarchus, which is pronounced Al-egz-ar'chus.

14. The letter p, when initial, and followed by n or by t, is not usually uttered, as in Pnigeus and Ptolemæus, which are pronounced Ni'geus and Tol'e-mæ-us, though some persons sound the p.

15. Ph represents the Greek character φ , and is pronounced as f; thus, Philippi is pronounced Fi-lip'pi. But when ph is followed by a consonant in the same syllable, as in Phthia, it is usually omitted in utterance, and the word is pronounced Thi'a. Some scholars, however, pronounce it.

16. Ps represents the Greek character ψ , which as an initial is pronounced as s, the p being generally omitted in utterance, as in Psyche, which is pronounced Sy'ke. Many scholars, however, now pronounce the p as well as the s of ps

17. As a general rule, when any combinations of consonant letters which are difficult to utter occur at the initial part of words, the utterance of the first may be omitted, thus, Tmolus may be pronounced Mo'lus; Mnemos; ne, Ne-mos'y-ne; while the digraph ch is dropped in Chthonia, making the pronunciation Tho'ni-a.

Silver coins of 20 cents, 5 cents, and 3 cents are also current, but no longer coined.
Uruguay. The peso or dollar is the unit, as in great part of Spanish South America, divided into 100 centesimos or cents; approximate value 4s. 3d., or £1=4.70 pesos, as There are gold doubloons of 10 pesos, as well as half and quarter doubloons. The silver coins are pesos, and pieces of 50, 20, 10, and 5 centesimos.

Venezuela. The chief coins are the silver venezolano or dollar of 100 centavos, and the bolivar of 20 centavos. The former is identical with the 5-franc piece of the Latin Union of Europe (see FRANCE), and the latter with the franc. There are also gold venezolanos.

West Indies. In the British islands the currency is that of the home countries, though reckoning by dollars and cents is common, and American coins are also current. See JAMAICA.

Algeria. As in France.

Argentine Republic. The French or metric system has been established by law; but the old Spanish weights and measures are in common use; as, the quintal=101*4 lbs.; the arroba=25*3 lbs.; the fanega=1.5 bush. See SPAIN.

Australian Colonies. Same as Britain. Austria-Hungary. The French or metric system is now in force, the names of the different weights and measures being much the same as in France or Germany. The following old weights and measures may be ronowing old weights and measures may be given here: the fuse or foot (of 12 zoil)= 1 0871 foot: the klafter=6 fuse; the meile=4½ or 4 714 miles; the centmer=123½ lbs.; the eimer=12 457 gallons; the joch=1 422 acre; the metze=17 bushel.

Belgium. Same as France.

Bolivia. The French or metric system has Bolivia. The French or metric system has been prescribed by law, but the old Spanish weights and measures are generally in use, such as: the libra (or pound) = 1°014 lb.; the quintal=1014 lbs.; the arroba=25°3 lbs. or 6.7 gallons; the gallon=74 of an imperial gallon; the qara=927 of a yard or 83°37 inches; the square qara=859 of a sq. yard. inches; the square qara = 300 of a sq. yard. Brazil. The French or metric system has been established by law, but old weights and measures are in common use; as, the libra (or pound)=1'012 lb.; the arroba = 32'38 lbs.; the quintal=120'54 lbs.; the vara = 1'215 yd.; the almuda=3'68 gallons.

Bulgaria. As Turkey.

Canada. As Britain; but the British hundredweight and ton have been abolished and a hundredweight of 100 lbs. and a ton of 2000 (as in the United States) have been substituted. The metric system is also permitted.

Cape Colony. Same as Britain with slight exceptions. The regular measure of land, for instance, is the morgen = 2 1165 acres; also 1000 Cape feet = 1083 imperial feet. Old Dutch measures are to some extent in use.

Central American States, namely: Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Salvador. The French or metric system is more or less in use; commonly also the old Spanish weights and measures. See SPAIN. Ceylon. As in Britain.

Chili. The French or metric system has been established by law, but the old Spanish weights and measures are still in use, as in Bolivia, &c.

Botwa, &c.

China. There is no proper system of weights and measures established by government. The chief weights (as established by treaty) are the tael or liang=1\frac{1}{2} \cdot \chi. the catty or \(kin=1\frac{1}{2} \) lb.; the picul or \(tan=183\frac{1}{4} \) lbs.

Measures of length are the \(tsun \) or inche; the \(chih \) or foot (of 10 \text{ tsun})=14^1 inches; the \(chang \) (of 10 \(chih \))=2 \(fathoms \) (nearly); the \(li = about \frac{1}{2} \) mile.

Colombia. The standard measures are those colombia. The standard measures are those of the French metric system; but the arroba of 25 lbs. the quintal of 100 lbs., and the cargo of 250 lbs. are in common use. The English yard is commonly employed as a measure of length.

Costa Rica. See CENTRAL AMERICAN STATES.

Denmark. The chief measures of weight are the pund or pound = 11023 lb.; the cent-ner of 100 pund = 11023 lbs; the last of 40 centher = 1 9684 ton; the skip-last (ship-last) = 2.559 tons.

The measures of length include the fod or foot=1.0297 foot; the alen (or ell) of 2 fod=2.0594 feet; the favn or fathom=6.1783feet; the mil or mile=4 68 miles or 8287.7 yards.

The measures of surface include the square fod = 1 06 square foot; the rode or rood = 17 sq. yards; the töndeland = 1 36 acre.

Measures of capacity include the tönde, which for corn=3.8 imperial bushels, for coal=4.6775 bushels; the pot=1.6991 pint; the kande=2 pots=8.398 pints; the anker=8 gallons; the tönde=28.885 gallons; the oxehoved (hogshead)=48.425 gals.

Ecuador. The French metric system has been established by law; but the old Spanish system is generally in use, as in Bolivia, &c.

Egypt. The chief measures of length include the pik or draa, which is of various denominations, the pik or cubit of the Nilometer being 20 65 inches, the pik of merchaudise 25½ inches, the pik in building 20½ inches; the kassabah is 11 65 feet.

Superficial measures include the superficial measur

Superficial measures include the square pik=6 sq. feet; the square kassabah=15 sq. yards; the feddan=about an acre.

Measures of weight include the oke=2.7 lbs.; the cantar=98 lbs.; the ardeb of wheat or maize=318.6 lbs., of barley=237.6 lbs., of rice=410.4 lbs. As a measure of capacity the arded is equivalent to about 5} bushels.

France. The system of weights and measures established in France as one of the consequences of the great revolution, and borrowed from France by many other counborrowed from France by many other countries, is known as the metric system, because it is based on the metre. The metre is about one ten-millionth of the distance from the equator to one of the poles measured along a meridian, and its length is equal to 39.37 inches or 3.281 feet; hence 11 metres=12 yards. All the other measures of length are got either by subdividing or multiplying the metre by 10, the French system being entirely decimal in character.

The chief subdivisions of the metre are the decimates or tenth of a metre=3.937 the decimetre or tenth of a metre=3.937 inches, the centimetre or hundredth of a metre=3.937 of an inch, or nearly 4 or $\frac{1}{2}$ the of an inch or one-thirtieth of a foot; and the millimetre, or thousandth of a mètre = 039 or 1 th of an inch.

The chief multiple of the mètre is the kilomètre of 1000 mètres = 3280 87 feet, or 1098 6 yds., or fully three-fifths of a mile (more correctly 621 of a mile).

The chief weights are the gramme and the kilogramme (or 1000 grammes). The gramme is the weight of a cubic centimètre of distilled water, and the kilogramme is the weight of a cubic décimètre of distilled water at the temperature of 4 Centigrade water at the temperature of 4 Centigrade of the control of t water at the temperature of 4 Centigrade or 39 'l' Fahr. In English weight the gramme = 15.43 grains; the kilogramme = 2.2 lbs. or 55.27 oz. The guintal or centner = 220.4 lbs.; the tonneau = 2204 lbs.

The measures of surface are mostly named after the corresponding measures of length; the square centimetre = 155 of a square inch, the square termineter = 1550 is square intri, or 1 sq. inch = 6'45 sq. centimeters; the sq. décimètre = 15½ sq. inches; the sq. mètre = 10^76 sq. feet; the are = 100 sq. mètres = 119^6 sq. yards; the hectare (100 ares) the common measure for land = 2'47 acres or 2 acres 2280 sq. yards (say 2½ acres). 'square kilomètre = 386 of a square mile.

The chief cubic or solid measures are the cubic centimetre='061 of a cubic inch; the cubic décimetre=61 cubic inches; and the cubic mètre or stère = 85.3 cubic feet or 1.3 cubic yard. Hence 1 cubic yard = '764 of a cubic mètre.

The standard measure of capacity is the The standard measure of capacity is the litre =61 cubic inches or 1.76 pint or 38 of a quart. The centilitre, or one-hundredth of a litre =07 of a gill; the décilitre = 703 of a gill; the décultre (or ten litres) =2.2 gallons; the hectolitre (100 litres) =2.2 gallons =2.75 bushels; the kilolitre (1000 litres) = 220 gallons =2.74 bushels =3.44 quarters.

Germany. Since 1872 the French metric system has been in force throughout the German Empire, the French designations having been adopted with little change, though vernacular German terms are also in use. Thus there are the meter or stab, the zentimeter or strich, the millimeter or neuzoll ('new inch'), the dekameter or kette ('chain'), the liter or kanne, the schoppen or half-litre, the scheffel or bushel = 50 litres; the zentner or hundredweight = 50 kilogramms; the pfund or pound = half a kilogramm, the tonne or ton = 1000 kilogramms. See France.

The German meile or mile = 4.68 English miles; the German geographical mile = one fifteenth of a degree of the equator.

fifteenth of a degree of the equator.

Greece. The French metric system has been long established, the mètre being called the pêcheus or cubit, the kilomètre the stadion, the décimètre the palamé, the centimètre the daktylos, the millimètre the gramme. The litre is called the litra, the décilitre the katyle, the hectolitre the koilon. The gramme is called the draohmé, and 1500 drachmai=1 mma=1½ kilogramme=3 3 lbs. The oka=2 34 lbs. SIGNS AND SYMBOLS

USED IN WRITING AND PRINTING.

MATHEMATICAL

- + Plus, the sign of addition or increase; as, a+b+c (read a plus b plus c); also marks a positive as opposed to a negative quantity.
- Minus, the sign of subtraction, diminution, or decrease; as, a-b-c; also marks a negative as opposed to a positive quantity.
- ± ∓ Plus or minus, leaving it doubtful whether a quantity is to be added or subtracted; one or other as the case may be.
- × The sign of multiplication; multiplied by or into: as, $a \times b$, or 8×5 .
- The sign of division; divided by; as, α+b, 24+6. Division is also indicated by placing one quantity above another with a horizontal line between; as, $\frac{a}{b}$, $\frac{24}{6}$.
- ~ The difference between two quantities, leaving it doubtful which is the greater; as, $a \sim b$.
- The sign of equality; equals; is equal or equivalent to; as, a=b, 10+2=12.
- > Is greater than; as, a>b, a is greater than b.
- < Is less than; as, a < b, α is less than b.
- ∞ Varies as, said of a quantity that increases or diminishes according as another quantity increases or diminishes; as, $a \propto b$.
- : Is to, :: as; signs used to indicate ratio or proportion; thus, a:b::c:d, that is, a is to b in the same ratio as c is to d; 3:5::6:10.
- .. Because or since, a=b and c=d. a+c. Therefore, b=b+d; that is, because a is equal to b, and c is equal to d, therefore a plus c is equal to b plus d.
- ∞ Indefinitely great; infinity.
- O Indefinitely small; a quantity less than any assignable quantity; zero.
- $\sqrt{}$ The radical or root sign. When used alone it indicates the square root; as, \sqrt{b} , $\sqrt{16}$.

 \sqrt{b} , $\sqrt{16}$. Higher roots are indicated by small figures called indices, thus, $\sqrt[3]{a}$, $\sqrt[4]{a}$, $\sqrt[5]{a+b}$, that is, the cube root of a, the fourth root of a, the tenth root of a, the other root of a, the same roots might also be indicated by small fractions, as, as, at, ato, and so on.

So also the powers to which quantities are raised are indicated by similar small figures or indices, thus, a3, a5, an, an-1, &c

- (), [], {} Indicate that the quantities inolosed are to be treated together as forming a single term or expression; as, $2(\alpha + \frac{1}{2} + 4)$.
- ∠Angle, the angle; as, ∠ABC, the angle ABC.
- L Right angle, the right angle; as, L ABC, the right angle ABC.
- ⊥ The perpendicular, perpendicular to; as, AB LCD, AB is perpendicular to CD.
- Parallel, parallel to; as, AB || CD, AB is parallel to CD.
- Δ Triangle, the triangle; as, Δ ABC, the triangle ABC.
- ☐ Square, the square; as, ☐ ABCD, the square ABCD.
- $\hfill \Box$ Rectangle, the rectangle; as, $\hfill \Box$ A B C D, the rectangle A B C D.
- O Circle, the circle; circumference; 360°.
- The number 3'1415926... that is, the ratio of the circumference of a circle to its diameter, approximately equivalent to 3} to 1, or 22
- Degree or degrees, whether of a circle or of temperature; as, 82° the freezing point of water (Fahr.), 260° the whole circumference
- 'Minutes in circular measurement, as, 6° 90', six degrees twenty minutes.
- " Seconds in circular measurement; as, 60", sixty seconds.

By means of chemical symbols, or formulas, the composition of the most complicated subthe composition of the most complicated substances can be very easily expressed, and that, too, in a very small compass. An abbreviated expression of this kind often gives, in a single line, more information as to details than could be given in many lines of letterpress.

When any of the above symbols stands by itself it indicates one atom of the element it represents. Thus H stands for one atom of hydrogen, O for one atom of oxygen, and Cl for one atom of chlorine.

When a symbol has a small figure or number underwritten, and to the right of it, such figure or number indicates the number of atoms of the element. Thus O₂ signifies two atoms of oxygen, S₅ five atoms of sulphur, and C₁₀ ten atoms of carbon.

When two or more elements are united to form a chemical compound, their symbols are written one after the other, to indicate the written one after the other, to indicate the compound. Thus H_0O means water, a compound of two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen; $O_19H_{19}O_{11}$ indicates cane-sugar, a compound of twelve atoms of carbon, twenty-two of hydrogen, and eleven of oxygen.

These two expressions as they stand denote respectively a molecule of the substance they represent, that is, the smallest possible quantity of it capable of existing in the free state. To express several molecules a large figure is pre-fixed; thus, 2H₂O represents two molecules of water, 4(C19H29O11) four molecules of cane-

When a compound is formed of two or more compounds the symbolical expressions for the compound are usually connected together by a comma; thus, the crystallized magnesic sul-phate is Mg8O₄,7H₂O. The symbols may also be used to express the changes which occur be used to express the changes which coour during chemical action, and they are then written in the form of an equation, of which one side represents the substances as they exist before the change, the other the result of the reaction. Thus, #Hs+0s=2HsO expresses the fact that two molecules of hydrogen, each containing two atoms, and one of oxygen, also con-taining two atoms, combine to give two mole-cules of water, each of them containing two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen.

THE SAME PASSAGE CORRECTED.

I WONDER if any man is as clever as he imagines himself. I know I have not the confidence in myself I had a month ago as an amateur cook. I think it was my friend Davidson who first put the idea in my head to try my hand at cooking. The way he would describe the cooking of steaks on his yacht would make any one's mouth water, and it seemed to be always steaks they had. I asked him how he learned to cook, and he gave me the secret in one lesson.* He said. "You just use plenty butter; that's how women can't cook properly: they grudge butter". It is five or six years since he first told me about his wonderful powers as a cook, and I have often longed for an opportunity to emulate him in the art. Davidson always got quite enthusiastic on this subject. He would say, "Man, when it was my turn, the fellows could hardly be kept on deck after the onions began to brown and the smell went up; and the doctor used to stand with a big rolling pin to keep Jamie and the rest of them back, and every minute they would be crying down that it would do fiue ".

I don't know anything about yachting, and any time I have been over two hours at sea I had no tuste for food. I always had more than I wanted. I remember going to Dublin, and at breakfast a tureen of ham and eggs was placed beside me, but by the time I had helped the company I had to go on deck and admire the prospect. An idea occurred to me, however, to get some companions to join me on a holiday with a caravan. "I would attend to the cooking," I said; but I never got any one to agree. I believe now if I had promoted each one to the office of cook I would have been successful, for I think every man-who has not tried it-is sure he is a born cook.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLATES.

PRECIOUS STONES.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF SOME OF THE MORE IMPORTANT.

A CERTAIN number of rather rare minerals get the name of precious stones or gems, all of them being possessed of great hardness and also of great beauty, especially when cut and polished, and all being highly valued as personal ornaments. It is difficult to give a complete or definite list of such stones. since from the most rare and beautiful among them downwards there is a gradual decrease in value and rarity, and it is impossible to say where to draw the line between what are distinctly precious stones and what are simply ordinary and commonplace mineral bodies. Fashion has also something to do with this matter, as a stone may be highly prized and commonly worn as an ornament at one period or among one community, and comparatively neglected at another period or by another community. Some precious stones, however, from their beauty and rarity have always and everywhere fetched a high price, more especially the diamond, ruby, sapphire, emerald, and oriental amethyst. These then hold a place in the front rank of precious stones, while in secondary order come a number of stones such as spinel, topaz, common or occidental amethyst, turquoise, beryl, opal, garnet, tourmaline, chrysoberyl, jargoon (or jargon), agate, cairngorm, &c. The nomenclature of precious stones is not very well settled, and therefore confusing, since jewellers and lapidaries may apply the same name to stones that are essentially different in their nature and that are named differently by the mineralogist. The name ruby, for instance, is applied to other stones besides the true or oriental ruby. The terms oriental and occidental, it may be remarked, are used in a peculiar sense in regard to precious stones, the former implying genuineness or superior quality, the latter implying inferiority, and neither having reference to locality or place of origin. It is not the matter of which precious stones are composed that gives them their value, since they mainly consist of ingredients very common in nature; it is their crystalline character, hardness, lustre, transparency, colouring, capacity for polishing, &c., that make them so highly prized. The diamond, it is well known, consists of pure carbon, while alumina (the main ingredient of common clay), silica, fluorine, magnesia, lime, &c., form the chief ingredients of some other precious stones. Their colours are generally due to minute admixtures of certain metals (such as copper and iron) in combination with other substances. The diamond is the hardest of all known substances, its hardness, in the scale used by mineralogists, ranking as 10. In beauty and value it stands first among precious stones, though the ruby, if of the weight of two or three carats, usually fetches a higher price. It is found of all colours, though generally colourless. Its beauty when cut is owing to its refracting powers, by which it throws back much of the light that falls upon it. The ruby and sapphire belong to what is known as the corundum group of stones, which are all mainly composed of alumina, and are next in hardness to the diamond. The ruby proper is to be distinguished from the red spinel or balas ruby, which it greatly resembles in appearance, though the latter is a compound of alumina and magnesia. The ruby is rose-red, crimson-red, or blood-coloured. The sapphire is distinguished by its azureblue colour, though white sapphires are also known. Emery, we may remark, is an amorphous form of corundum, so that the ruby and sapphire are practically crystalline forms of this humble substance. The emerald is a stone of a rich and beautiful green colour, consisting of silica, alumina, and glucina, with oxide of chromium giving the green tint. When of fine colour and quality it is one of the most precious of gems, Beryl is closely akin in composition, but is of comparatively little value. Chrysoberyl consists of alumina and glucina, and is next to the sapphire in hardness; it often presents a fine, opalescent play of light. The topaz is colourless or of various colours, yellow, orange, blue, pink, &c. It consists chiefly of silica and alumina. Colourless specimens when cut closely resemble diamonds, but the topaz is rendered very electric by heat or friction, which the diamond is not. The garnet forms a group of minerals varying considerably in composition, though silica is always an important ingredient. The prevailing colour is red of various shades; but brown, green, yellow, and black garnets are known. Tourmaline is a mineral of somewhat varied composition and colouring, some varieties being transparent, some opaque, some colourless, others green, brown, red, blue, and black. It often occurs in granitic rocks. The opal is a pellucid gem of various colours consisting of silicate with about 10 per cent of water, and is very brittle. It is characterized by its iridescent reflection of light, and is divided into many varieties, such as the precious or noble opal, which exhibits brilliant and changeable reflections of green, blue, yellow, and red; and the common opal, whose colours are white, green, yellow, and red, but without the fine play of colour. The turquoise is a greenish-blue opaque stone, consisting essentially of a phosphate of alumina, containing a little oxide of iron and oxide of copper. The true turquoise is only found in one locality in Persia. A number of beautiful gems are mere varieties of the common mineral quartz. Among these are amethyst, sard (chalcedony), blood-stone (heliotrope), agate, citrine, cairngorm, cat's-eye, rock-crystal, and various others. The ordinary or occidental amethyst (shown on the plate) is a violet-blue or purplish variety often used in jewelry, but too common to have a very high value. The oriental amethyst, which is of a similar colour, is a rare and valuable gem of the same class as the ruby and sapphire. The bloodstone is well known by its green colour and red spots. The agate is remarkable as consisting of a number of layers or bands of various colours blended together. When the stone is cut and polished the manner in which the colours are arranged often produces peculiar effects, giving rise to such names as moss-agates, star-agates, ribbon-agates, &c. The sard is noted for its waxy lustre, and the cat's-eye for its fibrous texture. The cairngorm takes its name from the mountain on the borders of Banffshire and Aberdeenshire. whence the finest Scottish specimens are obtained. The citrine and cairngorm are similar in appearance, and specimens of both sometimes receive the name of smoky quartz from their characteristic colour. The gem called peridot is a variety of the mineral chrysolite or olivine, which is composed of silica, magnesia, and iron. The green transparent varieties of chrysolite receive this name, the green being usually some shade of olive or leek green. Peridot is a rather soft gem, difficult to polish, and liable to lose its lustre and to suffer by wear. Jargoon or jacinth is the name given to transparent, bright-coloured varieties of the mineral zircon, of various shades of red, this mineral appearing also with other colours, as green and blue. Fine specimens of jargoon show a peculiar golden lustre. Jewellers often give the name jacinth or hyacinth to varieties of garnet or of quartz. Colourless specimens of zircon are sometimes passed off as diamonds, having a good fire and lustre when polished, but of course they are far inferior in value as they also are in hardness. The mineral sphene or titanite contains the somewhat rare metal titanium. It is of a yellowish or greenish-yellow colour, and the transparent varieties often display brilliant effects of light and colour.

The examples of precious stones shown on the plate have been selected for their representative character rather than for any individual interest which they possess. The diamond and the uncut ruby, however, have a certain extrinsic value inasmuch as they were both presented by Mr. Ruskin in 1887 to the natural history department of the British Museum—the diamond "in honour of his friend, the loyal and patiently adamantine First Bishop of Natal" (whence it is known as the Colenso Diamond); and the ruby, the Edwardes' Ruby, "in honour of the invincible soldiership and loving equity of Sir Herbert Edwardes' rule by the shores of Indus". The diamond is one of the S. African pale-straw-coloured stones, and is a particularly perfect crystal. Some of the examples on the plate exhibit the gem in its natural state and also cut, as in the case of the ruby, sapphire, spinel, and garnet. The garnet is shown in three different forms, as a native crystal (from Fort Wrangell, Alaska), as a cut faceted stone, and also cut in the peculiar concave-convex form in which it receives the name of "carbuncle". The beautiful example of beryl or aquamarine surrounded by crystals of topaz was found in the mountains of the Nertchinsk district, Transbaikalia (Siberia). The blue topaz, a very fine crystal, came from the government of Perm in Russia; the emerald from Santa Fé de Bogotá. Columbia, whence the finest emeralds have long been obtained; the sard and the blood-stone from India; the amethyst from Brazil; the opal from Queensland; the agate from Oberstein, Birkenfeld (Rhine valley), a famous locality for such stones; the spinel from Burmah, the large uncut stone from the palace at Ava; the peridot from an island in the Red Sea; the chrysoberyl from Ceylon; the turquoise from Arabia Petræa; the rock-crystal from Brazil; the cat's-eye or tiger-eye (crocidolite) from S. Africa, where many such stones are found.

MAMMALIA.

ILLUSTRATION OF TERMS RELATING TO THE STRUCTURE AND CLASSIFICATION OF MAMMALS.

The Mammals or Mammalia (from L. mamma, a breast or pap) form the highest class at once of the vertebrate animals and of the whole animal kingdom, and include all those animals that are familiarly termed 'quadrupeds', the whales and other fish-like creatures, and also man himself. They may be defined as animals that nourish their young for a longer or shorter period by milk, a fluid secreted in certain special glands (the mammary glands), and that possess a typical body-covering of hair. The possession of mammary glands and the nature of their body-covering sufficiently distinguish mammals from all other animals, though some mammals, as the whales, are almost hairless; and in certain others, as the hedgehog, the armadillo, &c., we find spines and horny or bony plates developed as a body-covering.

The skeleton of mammals exhibits a general plan of structure with which we are all tolerably familiar, as in most essential points it corresponds with what our own bodies possess. The vertebral column or spine may generally be divided into the definite regions of the neck, back, loins, sacral region, and tail, caudal, or coccygeal region. In man, monkeys, and certain bats the lowest number of vertebræ is found. The neck vertebræ are, with very few exceptions, seven in number, as in man, whatever the length of the neck. Thus the long-necked giraffe and the short-necked porpoise have the same number of bones in the neck. The dorsal or back vertebræ average thirteen in number; the lumbar vertebræ or those of the loins are very various in number; the sacral vertebræ (which in man unite to form a single bone) are rarely more than five; the coccygeal vertebræ (which in man become ossified to the sacrum) in long-tailed animals number from 30 to 46. The first cervical vertebra, called the atlas, supports the head, which fits into it by means of two articular processes of the posterior bone of the skull called the occipital condyles. The second vertebra (the axis) has a blunt process on which the atlas, together with the skull, turns. In birds and reptiles there is only one occipital condyle. From the vertebral column spring the ribs, which inclose the cavity of the chest or thorax. These bones vary greatly in number, but generally correspond to that of the dorsal vertebræ. They are divided into true and false ribs, the former being those that are joined to the sternum or breast-bone.

The limbs in mammals, like those of all the other vertebrate animals, are never more than four in number. The fore-limbs are invariably present, but in the whales and kindred animals the hinder limbs are absent. The limbs assume a considerable diversity of forms, from the arm and hand of man to the flipper of the whale. In the bats the digits or fingers of the anterior limbs are extremely elongated, and are united by a membrane through which the animal is enabled to fly. The bones of the fore-limb in mammals are the humerus, or long bone of the upper arm; the radius and ulna, or bones of the fore-arm, which may be fused together, and the latter of which is often rudimentary; the carpal bones, or those of the wrist; the metacarpal bones, succeeding the wrist; and lastly the phalanges, or bones of the fingers or digits. The bones of the posterior limb are normally the thigh-bone or femur; the two bones of the lower limb, viz. the tibia and fibula; the bones of the ankle, or tarsus; and the phalanges of the toes. The pelvic bones are those connecting the posterior limbs to the framework of the skeleton. The digits (fingers or toes) are normally five in number, but they may be reduced to one, as in the horse, in which the single digit represents the middle finger of man. Each digit has three phalanges, except the thumb, which has only two.

The skull is composed of various bones firmly united together, the sutures or lines of union being in most mammals distinctly visible. The jaws consist of various bones firmly united together, the parts corresponding to bones that are actually seen to be distinct in lower animals. The lower jaw or mandible is directly articulated to the skull, and not, as in birds and reptiles, by the intervention of a separate bone. Teeth of various forms are present in the great majority of animals. In the echidna, pangolin, and ant-ester, however, they are entirely absent; and the whalebone whales have them only in the fetal or embryonic state, and as the animal advances they disappear. The teeth are always lodged in special sockets (alveoli), and not ossified with the jaw-bones as in lower animals. The number of teeth varies greatly throughout the class. Man has 32 in his permanent set, a large armadillo has 90, while in the dolphins as many as 220 may be found. In form the teeth vary greatly, as is natural when we consider the vast differences in the diet of different animals. They are divided into incisors, canines, premolars or false molars, and molars, the incisors being in front and followed in the above order by the others. All these four kinds may not be present together. In most mammals two sets of teeth occur-a temporary or deciduous set (milk teeth) and a permanent set. Some animals have only one set, which continue through life, and they are therefore termed monophyodont; animals that have two sets are called diphyodont. From the form, number, and disposition of the teeth valuable characters in the classification of the mammalia are drawn.

Of the internal organs of the mammals the stomach is the one that displays the greatest diversity of structure. Though generally simple it often exhibits a division into compartments, this being especially remarkable in the case of the ruminating animals. The chest or thorax is always separated from the abdomen by a complete diaphragm or 'midriff', constituting a great muscular partition between these cavities, and acting as a most important agent in the movements of respiration. Such a muscular partition is not found in other vertebrates. The reproductive organs vary exceedingly in their conformation. In the lower mammals (kangaroos, duckmole, &c.) the female possesses two distinct uteri or wombs, and hence these animals are known as didelphous (Gr. dis, double, delphys, womb), while all other mammals are monodelphous. Another point in regard to the reproduction of the mammalia is the presence or absence of a placenta in the females. This structure, familiarly known as the 'afterbirth', is developed on the outside of the envelopes inclosing the fetus, and is so closely connected with the wall of the womb as to allow of an interchange of blood between the mother and the fetus or embryo. Certain animals (kangaroos, duck-mole, echidna) do not possess this organ, and are therefore called implacental or non-placental. The placenta, again, may be either deciduate or non-deciduate, according as certain tissues belonging to the maternal womb are cast off at birth or not.

The mammary or milk glands form the feature to which this class of animals owes its name. All mammals possess these glands, which, however, differ considerably in number and position throughout the class. They may be seen in the males as well as the females, but in the former they are undeveloped and functionally useless. These glands are placed in the ventral or lower surface of the body, and their number varies from two to twenty-two. They may be situated on the breast, being then called 'pectoral', or farther back and on the abdominal surface, being then called 'ventral' or 'abdominal'; in some cases they are in the groin ('inguinal'). In ruminants the glands are united so as to form the udder. from the surface of which rise the teats. In the marsupials (kangaroos, &c.) the teats are contained within the characteristic marsupium or pouch. The young of these mammals do not require to suck, nor at first are they able to do so, but there are special muscles by which the parent can eject the milk into their mouths.

The orders into which the mammals are generally divided are given below. It may be mentioned that man is often classed in one order (Primates) with the Quadrumana, a method which is quite legitimate if regard is had merely to structural or anatomical characteristics.

Order I.—BIMANA (Two-handed). Man.

Characters: posture always erect, progression bipedal, the lower limbs being exclusively devoted to this purpose; anterior limbs shorter than posterior, and exclusively used for prehension; thumb can be opposed to the other digits; great toe or hallux not opposable to the other digits; teeth forming a nearly even and uninterrupted series; brain proportionately larger than in any other animal, and with large and deep convolutions.

Order II.—QUADRUMANA (Four-handed). Apes, baboons, monkeys, lemurs, &c.

Characters: both hindfeet and forefeet usually prehensile, that is, the innermost toe of the hind limb is opposable to the others as well as the innermost of the fore limb, so that the animals are really four-handed (though the thumb of the fore limb may be wanting, and sometimes is not opposable); fore limbs often longer than the hind limbs; teats regularly two in number and pectoral in position; placenta deciduate; teeth uneven and interrupted by a diastema or interval.

Section A.—Catarrhina. Nostrils placed close together, aperture oblique and pointing downward; thumb of fore limb opposable. Apes and monkeys, found only in the Old World.

Section B.—Platyrhina. Nostrils placed far apart; thumb of fore limb absent or not opposable; tail prehensile. Monkeys of South America.

Section C.—Strepsirhina. Nostrils curved or twisted. The lemurs and their kindred, inhabiting Madagascar, Africa, and Eastern Archipelago.

Order III.—INSECTIVORA (Insect-eaters). Moles, Hedgehogs, Shrews, &c.

Characters: Molar teeth always serrated, and having numerous sharp cusps, so as to adapt them for crushing the insects on which they feed; usually five toes on all feet, and toes furnished with claws; walk on the soles of the feet (plantigrade); placenta deciduate.

Fig. 6.—Hedgehog (Erinaceus europæus).

Fig. 6a,—Skull of Hedgehog. The reference letters correspond with those of fig. 2, the bones having the same names.

Order IV.—CHEIROPTERA (Wing-handed). Bats.

Characters: Mammals adapted for flight, the four fingers of the hand being greatly elongated, so as to support a flying-membrane, which extends along the sides of the body uniting the fore and hind limbs of each side and frequently the hind limbs and tail; thumbs of the fore limbs of normal size; digits of the hind limbs of normal length and character; clavicles or collar-bones well developed; toeth of three kinds, the canines always well developed; teats pectoral, and two or four in number. The bats are divided into two sections, one of them containing the insectivorous bats, the other the frugivorous or fruit-eating bats. Many of them have a curious leaf-like appendage on the nose.

Fig. 7.—Crenulated Javelin Bat (Phyllostoma crenulatum); S. America.

a Molars. b Canines, large and well developed. c Incisors.

Order V.—RODENTIA (Gnawers). Rats, Mice, Hares and Rabbits, Beaver, &c.

Characters: Two long curved incisor teeth in each jaw (in upper sometimes four), separated from the molars by a wide interval; no canine teeth; molars and premolars few in number; feet usually with five toes, all having claws; teats generally numerous; placenta deciduate. The most notable feature in these animals is the incisors, which continue to grow through life, and present a chisel-like form from the hard enamel in front projecting above the comparatively soft dentine behind, which wears away more rapidly by gnawing.

Fig. 10.—The Beaver (Castor fiber); America. Hindfeet webbed for swimming; tail scaly and flattened horizontally. Order VI.—CARNIVORA (Flesh-eaters). Lion, Tiger, Bear, Dog, Cat, Wolf, &c.

Characters: Teeth always of three kinds, the canines being particularly large and well developed, and the molars usually with sharp or trenchant edges for cutting; jaws short and powerful; toes with sharp curved claws, often retractile; clavicles rudimentary or wanting; teats never fewer than four, abdominal; placenta deciduate. The order is divided into three well-marked sections.

Section A.—Digitigrada. Animals that walk on their toes, the heel being raised above the ground, as the Lion, Tiger, Dog, &c.

Section B.—Plantigrada. Animals that walk on the sole of the foot, the heel being little or not at all raised, as the Bears.

Section C.—Pinnigrada. Both fore and hind feet forming awimming paddles, the latter placed far back and nearly in line with the axis of the body.

Order VII.—PROBOSCIDEA. The Elephant.

Characters: Nose prolonged into a long cylindrical trunk or proboscis, movable in every direction; very sensitive, and having at its extremity the nostrils; no canine teeth; molars few in number; no incisors in lower jaw; incisors in upper jaw growing throughout life and forming 'tusks'; two mammary glands situated between the forelegs; placenta deciduate.

Fig. 21.—Indian Elephant (Elephas Indicus). Ears much smaller than in the African species.

Order VIII. -- HYRACOIDEA. The Hyrax.

Characters: No canine teeth; upper incisors long and curved and growing from permanent pulps as in the Rodentia; lower incisors straight; molars resemble those of the rhinoceros; four inguinal teats, and two in the axillæ or arm-pits. There is only the genus Hyrax in this order, one species of which is the 'coney' of Scripture.

Fig. 22.—Skull of Hyrax (Hyrax Capensis); S. Africa. Reference letters as in fig. 2.

Order IX.—Ungulata (Hoofed Animals). Ox, Sheep, Deer, Horse, Rhinoceros, &c.

Characters: Never more than four fully developed toes to each limb, that portion of the toe which rests on the ground always incased in a large thick nail or hoof; clavicles wanting; teats inguinal or abdominal; placenta non-deciduate. This order comprises three of the orders established in former systems of classification, namely, Ruminantia, Solidungula (Horses), and Pachydermata (Rhinoceros, &c.), which now form subdivisions of this large assemblage of animals. It is divided into two chief sections.

Section A. Perissodactyla (Odd-toed). Rhinoceros, Tapir, Horse, &c. Hindfeet always and forefeet generally odd-toed; stomach simple and not divided into compartments.

Section B. Artiodactyla (Even-toed). Hippopotamus, Pig, and all the Ruminants. Toes always two or four in number; stomach always more or less complex or divided into compartments.

RENAISSANCE ARCHITECTURE.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF ITS CHARACTERISTIC FEATURES IN THE 15th, 16th, and 17th CENTURIES.

THE ancient classic architecture of Rome, which was more or less borrowed from that of Greece, continued in use until the time of the Emperor Constantine, in the fourth century of our era, when the empire was transferred to Byzantium, henceforth called Constantinople. The style, however, becoming more and more debased as time went on, it fell mainly into two divisions, which have been denominated Romanesque or Byzantine, according as they exhibit the influence of Rome or that of Constantinople. During the middle ages and after the fall of the Roman Empire other styles were introduced, such as Saracenic, Moresque, and Gothic. But in Italy Classic art clung so tenaciously to the soil that no other style ever became naturalized; and as the Romanesque prevailed in Rome itself during the whole period of the middle ages, it was an inevitable consequence that Classic architecture should supersede Mediæval in that country. This revival to a purer art was practically commenced in Florence about the beginning of the fifteenth century, and it soon spread with great rapidity over Italy and the greater part of Europe. This time of revival has been distinguished by the Italians as the Cinque-cento period 1 (fifteenth century), but by the French it has been called the Renaissance. This latter term has become more generally adopted, from the style being a revival of the ancient architecture of Greece and Rome, and is applied to all modern classic work designed after the Italian manner.

One of the earliest architects of the revival was Brunelleschi (1377-1444), who after having studied antique art in Rome returned to Florence, his native city, in 1407, and was intrusted with the completion of the cathedral there. By him the great dome was erected—a work in size second only to that of St. Peter's at Rome, for which, it is probable, it served as a suggestive model to Michael Angelo. But the most complete work of Brunelleschi is the church of San Spirito at Florence (figs. 1 and 2). It is formed on the Latin cross, and the ceiling is flat and of wood. A contemporary Florentine architect, Alberti (1404-1488), assisted enthusiastically in the new movement, and erected the church of St. Andrea at Mantua besides other churches which have been justly admired. He also wrote a work on architecture, which is the foundation of all that has been since written on the art. It has been translated into all modern languages, and still deserves an attentive perusal by those who intend becoming architects.

The great hospital at Milan is an early example of this period, having been commenced in 1457 by Filarete, a Florentine architect. Fig. 9 represents a portion of one of the courts, of which there are several, but parts of them are now built up and disfigured by additions. When all the arcades were open, as here shown, they must have been very effective architecturally. The design is somewhat mediseval in character, as all the external windows are pointed and adorned with quasi-Gothic mouldings. To the northern face of this hospital, Bramante added a portico or corridor of the Ionic order.

St. Peter's at Rome (fig. 8), the grandest work of the modern classic school, was commenced in 1506 by Bramante (1444-1514), but it made slow progress. After the death of that architect, he was succeeded by Raphael (1483-1520), upon whose early death Peruzzi (1481-1536) was appointed. He was succeeded again by the celebrated San Gallo (1470-1546), who remodelled the whole design, but it does not appear that much was done towards carrying it out. All San Gallo's time and funds were employed in strengthening the piers of the great dome, and remedying the defects in construction made by his predecessors. After the death of San Gallo the work was committed to Michael Angelo (1474-1564). He strongly opposed San Gallo's design and greatly modified it, infusing new vigour and character into the work, although he could not alter the plan. To the consummate skill of this artist we owe the magnificent stone dome; the largest and loftiest work of the kind which has been ever erected in ancient or modern times. The church was not completed even at the death of Michael Angelo, who, however, had the satisfaction of seeing the dome practically finished. He left a model for the cupola to be erected upon the dome, which was faithfully built in accordance with his design. The East or Entrance front1 (fig. 8) is the work of Carlo Maderno (1556-1629). It extends in breadth far beyond the width of the nave, is formed of gigantic engaged columns, and the order is surmounted by a very lofty attic which adds to the height of the front without adding to its beauty. Maderno also completed the nave and other portions of the church; this, however, was not done until a century had elapsed from the time that the foundation was laid by Bramante.

Other developments of the Renaissance were carried out in other Italian cities, but more especially in Venice, which produced a vast combination of talent. Among the great architects of Venice stands conspicuously Sansovino (1479-1570), whose masterpiece is the well-known Library of St. Mark, an end view of which is shown in fig. 7. It consists of two orders, the lower one Roman Doric and the upper one Ionic. The upper entablature is remarkable for its great height, and contains small windows besides the beautiful sculptures by which it is decorated. The whole is crowned by a balustrade with figures upon the piers said to have been sculptured by the pupils of the architect. The lower story is an open arcade which is raised three steps above the level of the piazza. The campanile of the Greek church, Venice (fig. 6), is also the work of Sansovino, the design being evidently founded on the earlier campanile of St. Mark.

The greatest name of the period (coming, however, a little later) is that of Andrea Palladio (1518-1580), whose buildings are so numerous both at Venice and Vicenza, and are so remarkable for his own peculiar treatment, that they gave rise to the term "Palladian school." His church of San Giorgio Maggiore at Venice (fig. 3) is an example of his fertility of invention. Before his time the order in front of a church, when divided into nave and aisles, was carried across the whole building of the same height, leaving portions of the front false, over the lean-to roofs of the aisles; or two orders were adopted, one placed above the other. Palladio, by placing a larger order on pedestals (as seen in the example) and adding a smaller one on the floor line, overcame the difficulty in a very masterly manner.

The palaces erected in Rome, Venice, Florence, and other Italian cities during the sixteenth century were very numerous, and are among the finest architectural works in Europe. Of these the Farnese palace at Rome by San Gallo, the Pitti and Strozzi³ palaces at Florence, and the Vandramini palace⁴ at Venice are among the most celebrated.

The Pompei palace at Verona (fig. 13) is by San Micheli (1484-1549), the architect of the Grimani palace at Venice—a work which embraces all the elegance of classical art, with the most perfect appropriateness to the purposes of a modern palace. The Pompei palace, although by the same architect, is of a much more simple character. It has a basement of arched rustic work surmounted by engaged columns of the Doric order, with semicircular headed windows between.

From Italy the revived classic style soon spread to France. Francis I. invited Primaticcio, Benvenuto Cellini, Serlio, and others to that country, who were employed by him upon the palace of Fontainebleau and other works. The palace of the Louvre was begun by Pierre Lescot (1510-1578), and the first portion was completed by him in 1578. Various portions have been added thereto at different times by several architects, down to the time of the late empire. The portion given (fig. 11) represents the pavilion of Flora in connection with the Tuileries, and a part of the long gallery, but it has been somewhat modified and altered by Napoleon III. The palace of Versailles was the great work carried out during the long reign of Louis XIV. by the architects François Mansard (1598-1666) and his nephew Jules Hardouin Mansard (1647-1708). They also erected the church of the Invalides, and the former was engaged on the Louvre. The eastern façade of the Louvre was the work of Perrault (1613-1688).

The introduction of the Renaissance style into England was somewhat slower and more uncertain than into other parts of Europe. Among the earliest known examples in England of the pure Italian Renaissance are the monuments of Henry VII. and his mother, the Countess of Richmond, in Westminster Abbey. These were executed during the reign of Henry VIII. by Torrigiano (1472–1522), a Florentine, and a fellow pupil with Michael Angelo. It is said that he fled to England in consequence of his having quarrelled and broken with a stone the nose of Michael Angelo. The monument of Henry VII. was finished about the year 1519, and was looked upon with great admiration by English artists of that period.

Among many other foreign artists employed by Henry VIII. was the renowned Hans Holbein (1498-1543), who came to this country in 1526. He erected for the king the celebrated gates at Whitehall,5 and he is supposed to have designed the oak stall work in King's College Chapel, Cambridge. From these early artists of the Renaissance school English architects imbibed classic forms, and combining these with their own native style produced those beautifully picturesque old buildings which we call Elizabethan,6 and of which so many are still in existence. The most conspicuous name of this period in England was that of John Thorpe, who flourished from 1558 to 1608. He was architect of most of the principal and palatial edifices erected during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. The earliest work on architecture published in England was by John Shute in 1563. We now approach the time of Inigo Jones (1572-1652), the first English architect that worked in the pure Italian Renaissance, although his early work was in the debased style of the period. He visited Italy before 1605, and at Venice became acquainted with the works of Palladio, of whom he became an ardent admirer. His great work was the designs for the palace at Whitehall, of which only a small portion was ever erected, namely, the Banqueting House (fig. 12), now used as a royal chapel. This was begun in 1619 and finished in two years. Had the entire palace been erected as designed, it would have been by far the most magnificent as well as the largest in Europe. It was, however, conceived far beyond the means, as it was far beyond the wants, of the monarch for whom it was designed; and the political troubles of the time put a stop to the work, and prevented any other portion of it from being executed. Among the numerous works by this architect, are the church of St. Paul, Covent Garden, Shaftesbury House, Aldersgate Street, York Stairs, and a villa at Chiswick for the Duke of Devonshire. The design for this last was suggested by a villa at Vicenza by Palladio.

During the time of the Commonwealth the history of architecture is a blank, but on the restoration of the monarchy the art began to revive. The fire which destroyed London in 1666, a few years after the death of Inigo Jones, brough into notice England's great architect, Sir Christopher Wren (1632-1723), whose career began under Charles II. He was at Paris studying the works then going on there when the great fire occurred, and he hurried back to aid in the work of restoration. His first step was that of preparing a plan on which he proposed the city should be rebuilt, and had it been followed it would have made London not only one of the handsomest, but one of the most convenient cities in the world. The opportunity, however, was lost, and we cannot but regret the shortsightedness of our forefathers.

Although he was not able to induce the authorities of the time to adopt his plan for the rebuilding of the city, the fire gave him the opportunity of erecting St. Paul's Cathedral and about fifty other churches; and he so completely established his reputation that nearly every work of importance for well-nigh half a century was intrusted to his care. The greatest of all his works is, of course, St. Paul's, which, after St. Peter's at Rome, is the most splendid church erected in Europe in the revived style of classical architecture. The foundation-stone was laid in 1675, and thirty-five years afterwards the top stone of the lantern was laid by Sir Cristopher Wren, thus practically completing the building in 1710.

A building on which the fame of Wren is as justly founded as upon St. Paul's itself, is St. Stephen's Church, Walbrook, the interior of which is represented in fig. 5. It is divided longitudinally into five aisles by four rows of Corinthian columns (see plan, fig. 4). The four columns in the centre being omitted it forms an octagon on which arches are turned, and above which, by means of pendentives, a dome is formed with a lantern thereon, the whole producing, in a very small compass, the most pleasing interior of any Renaissance church which has yet been erected in England. Among the other works of Wren none are more eminently entitled to praise than the towers and steeples of his churches, and that of Bow Church (fig. 10) is beyond all doubt the most elegant of its class erected since the Reformation. There is in its composition a variety of outline and an elegance of detail which it is impossible to find in any other work of the kind. It is produced by a masterly investment of the form of a Gothic spire, with a clothing of Italian architecture.

Sir Christopher Wren had but one pupil who deserves any notice, Nicholas Hawksmoor (1666-1736), who erected the churches of St. Mary Woolnoth, Lombard Street; and St. George's, Bloomsbury, London. After his death James Gibbs (1683-1754), the architect of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and the Radclyffe Library, Oxford, succeeded to much of the public patronage. Other well-known architects of the time were Sir John Vanburgh (1666-1726), the architect of Blenheim House; W. Kent (1684-1748), architect of the Horse-Guards; Henry Flitcroft, who in 1733 erected St. Giles'-in-the-Fields, the last of the churches after the manner of Sir Christopher Wren; Robert and James Adam (1728-1794), who erected the Adelphi and Portland Place; and Sir William Chambers (1726-1796), the architect of Somerset House, and author of an excellent treatise on civil architecture, which is still a standard text-book. With Sir William Chambers it may be said that the pure English Renaissance was brought to a close.

The evil influence of the debased, or Rococo, style of architecture prevalent in France during the latter part of the reign of Louis XIV. and the reign of Louis XV., acted unfavourably upon the art in England. This was, however, in a great measure counteracted by the publication of Stuart and Revett's Antiquities of Athens, commenced in 1762, and continued by the Dilettanti Society. This splendid work, which was not completed for many years, caused such a strong feeling for Greek art that it became a mania. During the early part of this century no building was complete without a Doric portico, and between the years 1819 and 1822 Inwood built the new St. Pancras Church after the manner of a Greek temple in the Ionic style. But no English church is complete without a steeple, and the architect was obliged to add a lofty tower. This he did, violating all Greek propriety, by piling it up on the top of his temple.

With the reign of our present queen the Gothic revival set in, and the determination of parliament to erect the new parliament buildings in mediæval character gave a great impulse to the growing taste. At the present time the rage for Gothic has somewhat subsided, and a new style is in vogue, designated the "Queen Anne style." Why so called appears extremely doubtful, as nothing of a similar character appeared in that queen's reign.

REPTILES.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF TERMS RELATING TO REPTILES AND AMPHIBIA.

In popular language the classes of animals designated by naturalists Reptilia and Amphibia are both included under the common designation of Reptiles. They have many characters in common; and there seems to a general observer by no means the same necessity for arranging them in two classes, as for separating into three distinct classes the Mammalia, Birds, and Fishes. Older naturalists, indeed, among whom were Linnaus and Cuvier, considered the Amphibia as only an order of the Reptilia. Modern naturalists, however, guided by anatomical details, are agreed in placing the Amphibia, that is, the frogs, toads, and newts, &c., in a separate class from the reptiles. By Huxley the former have been arranged along with the fishes to form the group Ichthyopsida, one of the three primary sections into which he divides all vertebrata; while he puts the reptiles in the class Sauropsida along with the birds. Reptiles in general, however, are altogether different in most characters from birds, being coldblooded and covered with plates or scales instead of feathers, though they agree with birds in being produced from eggs.

The most obvious distinction between Reptiles and Amphibians, and one which is sufficient for general purposes, is, that the skin of the Reptilia is covered with scales or bony plates, while the Amphibia have the skin naked. The Reptiles also breathe universally by lungs; while the Amphibia breathe during the early part of their life, or even the whole of it, by gills or branchise.

REPTILES.

The body of reptiles is generally of an elongated form, the tortoises and their allies presenting the most notable exception to this rule. The limbs may be wanting, as in serpents; or only a pair may be developed, as in certain lizards; while in most reptiles all four limbs are present. The external covering varies greatly, and a distinction between the groups of reptiles has been based on the varying character this exhibits. Accordingly those that possess scales alone are designated Squamata or Squamate Reptiles (L. squama, a scale); those in which bony plates are developed in addition to scales (as crocodiles) are called Loricata or Loricate Reptiles (L. lorica, a coat of mail).

In the skeleton of reptiles the five regions into which the spine is ordinarily divided may be recognized:-the cervical, dorsal, lumbar, sacral, and caudal. The cervical vertebræ usually possess small ribs, and are generally seven in number. The dorsal vertebræ, which carry the ordinary ribs, vary in number. The sacral vertebræ, two in number, are united to form the single sacrum. The vertebree of the tail are numerous. In the python there are as many as 422 vertebræ in all. The bones of the shoulder-girdle on either side include a scapula or shoulder-blade, and a coracoid bone, the latter articulating with the sternum or breast-bone. The fore limbs consist each of a humerus or bone of the upper arm, of a radius and ulna (fore-arm), of three carpal or wrist bones, and of five digits. The hinder limbs are of similar structure. The skull of reptiles has but one occipital condyle (as in birds) by means of which it articulates with the spine.

The teeth are generally well developed in reptiles, but in the tortoises and turtles there are no teeth, the jaws, like those of birds, being simply ensheathed in horn. The reptilian teeth, like those of the lower vertebrata generally, are adapted less for mastication than for merely retaining the food while it is being swallowed. Save in crocodiles and some extinct forms the teeth are not implanted in sockets, but are attached in various ways and by bony union to the jaw-bones. As seen in the poison-fangs of serpents several of the teeth may be modified for special purposes. The teeth vary greatly in number. The tongue may be elongated, distensible, and bifid, as in many lizards and serpents; or short, thick, and non-protrusible, as in other lizards; or it may be completely attached and fixed, as in crocodiles. The stomach is mostly pear-shaped, and in serpents it is capable of great distension. In the crocodiles it resembles the gizzard of a grain-eating bird in its high muscularity. The intestine is generally short, and exhibits a division into the small and the large portions. The rectum terminates in a cloaca which (as in birds) forms the common chamber in which terminate the efferent ducts of the urinary and generative organs. Reptiles eat and drink comparatively little, and can go without food for a long time.

The heart in reptiles consists of two auricles (right and left) and one ventricle, except in crocodiles, which animals possess two auricles and two ventricles. The chief peculiarity in the circulation consists in the mixture of venous with arterial blood, which takes place in the common ventricle of the heart in ordinary reptiles, and in the neighbourhood of that organ in crocodiles. In the ventricle the venous blood from the system and the pure or arterial blood from the lungs are mixed together, and the ventricle by its contractions drives this mixture at once to the lungs and through the system. The general system in the reptiles, very different from what is the case in birds and mammals, is nourished by impure or mixed blood. This circulation also exists in the amphibia, which, together with the reptiles proper, present a slow respiration and sluggish habits. Respiration is carried on solely by means of lungs, the presence of branchize or gills always in early life, and sometimes in the adult life also of amphibians, constituting a marked difference between the latter and reptiles. In serpents and some lizards only one lung is fully developed, the right lung being usually abortive.

Reptiles possess the various senses in tolerable perfection. The nasal cavities are of large size and open posteriorly into the mouth. In the crocodiles the hinder apertures open very far back in the mouth, this arrangement enabling these animals to hold their prey under water so as to drown it, whilst their own respiration is carried on unimpeded through the nostrils. The eyes of reptiles are usually of small size, and as regards their protective coverings vary throughout the class. In serpents there is a transparent membrane in front of the eye, supplying the place of eyelids, and hence the stony gaze of these animals, no process of winking taking place. This membrane is shed periodically along with the skin. In the lizards movable and ordinary eyelids exist, while in the tortoises there is a nictitating membrane. The ear is more or less perfectly developed. The crocodiles possess a movable valve by which they can close at will the tympanum of each ear; in these, too, most of the structures found in the higher vertebrata are represented.

The young of all reptiles are produced from ova or eggs. The ova are in general retained within the body of the parent until the development of the young has proceeded to some extent. In some serpents and lizards the young actually escape from the eggs while the latter are still contained within the parent oviduct. This mode of reproduction is what is known as ovo-viviparous. The eggs are in general of comparatively large size, and provided with a thick parchment-like shell and a large yolk. In many instances the eggs are deposited in sand and hatched by the sun's heat.

Reptiles are adapted by nature for very various modes of life. They may be fitted for living either on land or in the water, and some of them (such as the dragons) can even sustain themselves during short flights in the air. The extinct pterodactyls seem to have been endowed with excellent powers of flight, having large wings somewhat similar to those of the bats. Some of them live constantly in the water, as the turtles; while the crocodile and alligator, though most at home in the water, frequently betake themselves to the dry land. They reach their greatest development both as regards size and as regards numbers in the tropical regions. Some of them furnish food for man, though as a whole they are of little direct benefit to mankind.

Living reptiles are divided into four orders, viz. the Lizards, the Crocodiles, the Tortoises, and the Serpents, as below. In former periods of the earth's history many reptiles of gigantic size and strange form inhabited our globe, very different from those that now exist. These extinct forms have been classed, on the evidence of fossil remains, into several orders additional to those here given.

Order I .- SAURIA. Lizards.

Characteristics: Body elongated, covered with scales or plates; limbs four or two, or even entirely wanting (as in the blindworm).

Order II.—CROCODILIA. Crocodiles.

Characteristics: Body long; back part of the neck, body, and tail covered with hard bony plates, embedded in the substance of the skin, and covered with a fleshy cuticle. Jaws very large and strong; limbs short; toes—anterior, five; posterior, four, united with a web.

The crocodiles, by some writers, are considered as a family of the lizards.

AMPHIBIA.

It has been mentioned above that the Amphibia differ from the reptiles in always possessing gills in early life and in having the skin naked. To these points of difference we must add that in the Amphibia the skull is joined to the spine by two condyles, while the reptiles have only one. Another and most characteristic feature of the Amphibia is that they undergo a metamorphosis in the course of their development—the phases of such metamorphosis being familiarly exemplified in the series of changes through which the tadpole of the frog becomes developed into the perfect animal.

Order I.—Anoura (Tailless). Frogs and Toads.

Characteristics: Destitute of tail; body broad and short; skin naked and moist; limbs four; head flat and broad; gape wide. Undergo a metamorphosis, the young animal or tadpole having a tail, which is afterwards absorbed.

Order II.—URODELA (With a distinct tail). Newts, Salamanders, &c.

Characteristics: With a perfect and conspicuous tail; body elongated. They undergo a metamorphosis, the tadpole having a tail, which it retains through life.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLATES.

SIGNALS.

THE INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM OF SIGNALLING AT SEA.

THE immense increase in the world's shipping and the commercial intercourse of nations has rendered it a matter of the highest importance that ships should have a simple means of communicating with each other at sea, and also if necessary with persons on shore. Various systems have been proposed and more or less adopted, a well-known one being that of Captain Marryat; but the International Code of Signals issued by the British Board of Trade is now the one that may be said to prevail all over the world. The International Code was prepared and first published in 1857, in accordance with the views and recommendations of a committee of eminent naval authorities appointed in 1855. In that Code eighteen flags of various colours were employed, namely, one burgee, four pennants, and thirteen square flags, besides a distinctive Code Flag or Answering Pennant. The eighteen flags represented the consonants of the alphabet, with the exception of X, Y, Z, and it was by combinations of two, three, or four of these flags—the flags being hoisted one above the other—that arbitrary signs were made, representing a multitude of words and sentences, the meaning of any particular combination being laid down in the code-book.

After the lapse of thirty years the Code of 1857 was found insufficient for the increasing requirements of the Mercantile Marine, and accordingly the Board of Trade in 1887 appointed a committee to bring it up to date. This committee submitted a slightly revised edition to the Board in 1889, but certain subsequent suggestions made by foreign governments gradually led it to undertake a comprehensive revision of the whole. The new International Code thus prepared was soon adopted by most of the maritime powers, and finally displaced the old one on January 1, 1902, though during 1901 it was in use along with its predecessor. Many of the more important three-flag signals of the old Code are now made by two flags, and all the four-flag signals of the old Code, except those denoting names of places and ships, can now be made by two- or three-flag hoists, whilst many new signals of not more than three flags have been introduced. These changes make signalling by flags a more rapid and more certain process than formerly, and were rendered possible by the adoption of a complete flag alphabet of twenty-six letters. The flags used in the Code consist of two burgees, five pennants, and nineteen square flags, in addition to the Code Flag or Answering Pennant. The system of Distant Signals, formerly based on the use of balls, square flags, and pennants, has been completely transformed (see lower right quarter of the Plate). The new Code also contains for the first time particulars of the systems of signalling by movable semaphore, of semaphoring by hand flags, and of signalling in the Morse Code by flashes of light, or blasts of sound, or by flag-waving.

If a ship wishes to make a signal she hoists her ensign with the Code Flag under it. The ship signalled to responds by hoisting the Answering Pennant at the dip, that is, about two-thirds of the way up. The first ship then makes her signal where it can best be seen, each hoist being left flying until the other ship has hoisted her Answering Pennant close up, and so indicated that the signal has been understood. The answering ship waits for the next hoist with her Answering Pennant at the dip, and if the signal be not understood she keeps her pennant there and hoists some such signal as Vol. IV.

OWL ("I cannot make out the flags; hoist the signal in a better position") or WCX ("Signal not understood, though the flags are distinguished"). When the first ship has finished signalling, her ensign is hauled down. The Code Flag over Flag E is the Alphabetical Signal No. 1, and denotes that the signals which follow are spelled out alphabetically, and do not represent the arbitrary combinations of the code. Since each letter of the alphabet has a corresponding flag any word may be easily spelled out; but if it consists of more than four letters two or more hoists must be used, as no hoist is to consist of more than four flags. The Code Flag over Flag F, or Alphabetical Signal No. 2, indicates the end of a word made by alphabetical signals, or a dot between initials. The Code Flag over Flag G, or Alphabetical Signal No. 3, indicates that the alphabetical signals are ended. The Code Flag over Flag M is the Numeral Signal No. 1, and is used to indicate that the following hoists denote figures in accordance with the special numeral table. According to this table the flags A to J represent the numbers 1 to 10 in order; the flags K to S represent 11, 22, 33, &c., to 99; T stands for 100; and U to X for 0, 00, 000, 000000. Numeral Signal No. 2 (Code Flag over N) denotes the decimal point, and Numeral Signal No. 3 (Code Flag over O) indicates the end of the special numeral signals.

Some of the alphabetical flags, namely B, C, D, P, and S (see Plate, upper left), have special meanings when used singly. Flag L (see Plate, QUARANTINE FLAGS) is the Cholera, Yellow Fever, or Plague Flag, and must be flown by every ship in which there is or has been during the voyage, or during the stay in the port of departure, or in a port in the course of the voyage, any case of cholera, yellow fever, or plague. Abroad, Flag Q is generally used to denote a vessel liable to quarantine. The other three single hoists shown in the lower left quarter of the Plate are British flags used for special purposes. The total number of two-flag signals of the Code is 650, and these are practically all signals of an urgent and important character. Twenty-six additional two-flag signals, including the three alphabetical and three numeral signals above mentioned, are obtained by flying the Code Flag over an alphabetical flag. In the lower left quarter of the Plate fourteen two-flag hoists are shown, with the meanings as given in the Code. It should be noted that the alphabetical arrangement of the flag-letters runs parallel with an alphabetical arrangement of subjects: thus, all signals from AL to BV refer to Accidents, those from EP to FL to Boats, and so on.

The twenty-six flags of the Code can be combined to form no less than 15,600 three-flag signals. By adding the number of hoists obtainable by using the Code Flag over or under two alphabetical flags, a grand total of 16,900 three-flag signals is obtained. In the new Code advantage has been taken of this large number of combinations to provide three-flag hoists for almost all conceivable signals. Fourteen examples of three-flag hoists, with their meanings, are given in the Plate. To make them easy to recollect and to refer to, the three-flag hoists are arranged in well-defined-groups. In general outline the arrangement is as follows: Signals from ABC to AQC denote Magnetic Bearings; AQD-AST, Compass Bearings; ASU-AVJ, Money; AVK-AXF, Measures of Length; AXH-AXZ, Measures of Surface; AYB-AZW, Cubic Measures; AZX-BCN, Measures of Weight; BCO-BDZ, Decimals and

Fractions; BEA-CWT, Auxiliary Phrases; CXA-ZMR, General Vocabulary; Code Flag over AB-DH, Latitude; Code Flag over DI-KP, Longitude; Code Flag over KQ-QL, Time; Code Flag over QM-TS, Barometer; Code Flag over TU-ZY, Thermometer; and Code Flag under UA-ZY, Numerals. The four-flag signals ABCD to BFAU denote the names of places arranged according to their geographical position, and those from CBDF to CZYX form a special spelling table.

In the lower right quarter of the Plate some examples are given illustrative of signalling by means of the fixed semaphore or of shapes. These are used when, owing to distance or the state of the atmosphere, the colours of flags cannot be distinguished, or as an alternative system of signalling under ordinary conditions. The shapes used (see first row on Plate) are: a cone point upwards, for which a square flag may be substituted; a ball; a cone point downwards, for which a pennant may be substituted; and a drum, for which a tied flag may be substituted. In the semaphore system these four shapes are represented by the positions of the arm shown on the Plate (second row). The shapes, or the corresponding positions of the semaphore arm, are known by the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4 in the above order. The Code Flag is represented by the signal 421, and there is a complete alphabet, besides special signals, &c. (see Plate).

FOUR-MASTED SHIP.

THE vessel illustrated is of a type recently introduced, and exhibits the great advance recently made in the construction of merchant sailing ships. To the eye there is no very great difference between a large three-master and a four-master, but the latter possesses several advantages over the former which render the increasing use of these vessels highly probable. In a four-masted vessel the masts, yards, and sails do not require to be so large as in a three-master in order to receive an equal wind-pressure, the rigging has less height and greater spread transversely, and consequently there is less difficulty in working the ship, and less danger of dismasting. The wind-pressure is also more equally distributed fore and aft, and the centre of effort of the sails being lower down, the vessel heels over less and thus gains in speed, while also answering better to her helm. Another advantage is that such vessels can be more easily managed in tacking and wearing at sea owing to the jigger-mast and fore-mast being nearer the ends of the ship, and thus giving a more powerful leverage when required. In our plate the fourth or jigger mast is barque-rigged, but it is often square-rigged like the others. A further advantage is that the dimensions of the three foremost masts and their yards can be so arranged that all the principal sails are interchangeable, so that only a limited number of spare sails is required. The vessel shown in the plate carries upper and lower topsails and topgallant sails: this is an improvement that had been previously introduced in three-masted vessels. The adoption of the four-masted rig has enabled larger sailing vessels to be introduced than was found practicable with three masts, 2300 tons being about the extreme tonnage of three-masters, while four-masters range from 2000 to 3800 tons. From their greater handiness, too, these vessels can be managed by a relatively smaller number of hands, and thus are less expensive to keep afloat.
